"One Canon reduced to writing by God Himself, two Testaments, three Creeds, four General Councils, five centuries, and the series of Fathers in that period—the three centuries, that is, before Constantine, and two after, determine the boundary of our faith."

PREFACE.

THIS Volume which forms one of Messrs Macmillan's well-known Theological Manuals has been for some time in preparation and at length is in the reader's hands. The wide circulation, which has been attained by other Volumes in the series, encourages the hope that like them it will be found to supply a want.

The present Treatise forms an Introduction to the Articles of the Church of England. I have used the term "Introduction" designedly. The Volume is not intended in any degree to enter into competition with such works on the same subject as those of Bishop Burnet, Bishop Beveridge, Bishop Browne, or Bishop Forbes. It contains numerous references to their works and to others of more recent authority, and the notes and illustrations, with which it is supplied, are intended to guide the student to the Authors, who have written more largely on the different topics which again and again challenge discussion.

The great object I have kept in view has been to secure as much clearness and distinctness of statement as possible, and by dividing the text into consecutive paragraphs, to emphasize the chief points which call for the student's attention in grasping the meaning and interpretation of the Articles. Hence also I have constantly endeavoured to trace the connection of the several Articles; to indicate their source, object, and aim in the light of the great movements which called them forth; and then to illustrate and explain by reference to Holy Scripture and Patristic writers the statements they contain, and to support these, where necessary, by reference to other symbolical writings of the Anglican Church, her Prayer-Book, Ordinal, Homilies, and Canons.

In the interpretation of the Articles I have striven always to give due weight to their plain and grammatical sense, as they were understood by the divines of the period of Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth, and wherever the language of the Articles themselves has been doubtful or obscure, to remember the recommendation of the Canon of 1571 laid down in the same Convocation that required subscription to the Articles, to put forth only "that, which is agreeable to the doctrine of the Old and New Testaments, and that which the Catholic doctors and ancient Bishops have collected out of the same doctrine." "The Church of England," writes Bishop Bull, "professeth not to deliver all her Articles as essentials of faith without the belief whereof no man can be saved; but only propounds them as a body of safe and pious principles, for the preservation of peace to be subscribed, and not openly contradicted by her sons1." "We do not hold our Thirty-nine Articles," says Archbishop Bramhall, "to be such necessary truths, 'extra quam non est salus,' 'without which there is no salvation': nor enjoin ecclesiastic persons to swear unto them, but only to subscribe them, as theological truths, for the preservation of unity among us, and the extirpation of some growing errors?" Made originally as comprehensive as possible<sup>3</sup> they are to be regarded as Articles of Peace intended to include and not exclude different schools of thought.

In compiling this Introduction to the Articles I have had the advantage of the advice and co-operation of my friend and colleague the Rev. W. W. Williams, Fellow of S. Augustine's College. He has carefully gone over the sheets and made many suggestions, which his extensive Patristic reading has made very valuable. I must also acknowledge with my best thanks the kindness of Messrs G. Bell and Co., for allowing me to make use of Appendix iii, to Archdeacon Hardwick's History of the Articles, and to place side by side the Latin Articles of 1563 and the English Articles of 1571. Nor must I forget the help I have received from one of our Augustinian Students, Mr P. R. L. Fisher, who has verified for me many of the references in the text and the notes, and last but not least from the staff of the Cambridge University Press for not a few valuable hints and suggestions, while the work was passing under their hands.

If this Introduction shall in any degree serve as a help to Theological Students in their study of the Articles, my labours will have been amply rewarded, and I shall feel I have attained the object at which I have aimed<sup>1</sup>.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE fact that a second Edition of this "Introduction to the Thirty-Nine Articles" has been called for within less than twelve months seems to show that at least in some measure it serves the purpose for which it was intended.

The task of preparing this Edition has fallen to a great extent on my friend and colleague Mr Williams, who rendered such signal service in the preparation of the first. In the present Edition he has incorporated the results of friendly criticisms which have reached us from various quarters, and in the additional notes at the end of the volume has supplied from his own wide reading and careful investigation much that will help to illustrate several points, which of necessity have been but briefly noticed in the body of the book.

We both desire to express our obligations to several friends for their kindly communications, and especially to the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, who has evinced a very welcome interest in the volume, and has offered not a few valuable suggestions, of which we have been glad to avail ourselves.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION.

DURING the fourteen years which have elapsed since the first publication of this book, the conditions of theological teaching have changed considerably. A new and higher standard has been set. Theology is now presented not, as formerly, to a few selected men in the older Universities, but to the average candidate for Holy Orders as founded upon a philosophy which is no narrower than life; in a word, it has been brought for him under the category of the universal. The attempt has been made, in this new and revised edition, necessarily in a limited and imperfect manner, to suggest this great fact. At any rate this purpose has been, throughout, in the mind of the reviser. Wherever an opportunity has seemed to offer itself for pointing to the wider outlook, it has been taken. Besides, certain ambiguities have been corrected, some historical, others theological. Additional notes have been added in an Appendix. The obligation of loyalty to the revered memory of Dr Maclear has never been forgotten. No one ever welcomed criticism more readily than did he. There never was a mind freer from prejudice. Requiem aeternam dona ei, Domine.

THE REVOLT FROM ROME. THE UNIVERSITIES OF EUROPE IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I.

Origin of the Articles.

- i. The Articles of the Church of England are a distinct product of the Sixteenth Century. They were drawn up amidst the mighty controversies, which convulsed the Church at the time of the Reformation. The original object, therefore, of the compilers will be best ascertained by remembering the peculiarities of the crisis which led to their promulgation.
- ii. The Need of some Reformation had long before the Sixteenth Century been felt in well-nigh every province of the Western Church. The abuses, which had pervaded the whole system of the Church, had been pressed on the attention of successive Popes, Kings, Parliaments, Councils, and Diets<sup>2</sup>. Select committees of Cardinals, like that will, Papal reservations and provisions, destruction of the rights of patronage of bishops and chapters, the exaction of firstfruits and tenths, grants of exemption from the visitatorial power of bishops, the excessive liberty of appeal to the Pope in cases which had not been heard in the inferior courts." Creighton's History of the Papacy, i. p. 221; for the same desire of reform at the council of Constance 1414 see Ibid. p. 261.

<sup>2</sup> Comp. Hardwick, Middle Age, p. 371, n. 3. At the Council of Pisa A.D. 1409 "the prelates and proctors of England, France, Germany, Poland, Bohemia, and Provence presented to the Pope a list of grievances to which they called his attention, as deviating from the old laws and customs of the Church. They enumerate translations of bishops against their

appointed by Pope Paul III. in 1538, for the reform of the Church, only touched the surface of scandals, against which the disciples of Wiclif in England, of Huss and Jerome of Prague in Bohemia, had protested in vain. Even the Popes themselves, had their limitations allowed of it, might have reformed the Church. But they took no effectual steps in the right direction<sup>1</sup>, and the sale of Indulgences under Pope Leo X. precipitated the revolt of the Teutonic Churches from the Roman centre<sup>2</sup>.

iii. The Guiding Principle of the Church of England in the Sixteenth Century was not any wish to found a new Church or a novel system of her own, but to return to the old paths3; not to make a new, but to bring back the old national Church; not to break away from the rest of Christendom, but only to extinguish a jurisdiction founded upon conditions no longer prevailing4, and

The great attempt, which found expression in the councils of Pisa (1409), Constance (1414), Basel (1431), and culminated in the council of Trent (1542—1563) was only in part due to the Papacy. It is doubtful whether, but for the efforts of the Emperor, the Universities, and the Nations, it would ever have been made, and it is most naturally associated with such names as those of the Gallicans D'Ailly and Gerson. Caraffa, who afterwards became Pope Paul IV., was a devout man and a great reformer of abuses, but in the words of a distinguished Roman Catholic writer of to-day, speaking of "the nine Popes who successively followed Nicholas V. (d. 1455)," "it is not too much to say that under such Pontiffs moral scepticism must have radiated from those who sat in the Apostolic Chair." Lilly's Claims of Christi-

The Reformation fell back upon the ancient Creeds in their integrity. For the most part, those symbols were laid as the foundations of the new superstructure, and were assumed into its formularies; thus establishing at the very outset a broad basis of connection and unity with the faith as delivered by the Apostles to the Church, and by the learning, zeal, and fidelity of the Church expressed in these primitive standards." Winer's Confessions of Christendom, Introd. p. xiii.

by following in the footsteps of the Primitive Church, to eliminate the essentially pagan and non-christian element which had intruded itself into her.

- iv. The Revolt of England from Rome differed from the revolt on the Continent. In Germany and Switzerland a religious movement preceded and caused a political change. In England the political change came first, and the religious change afterwards, and in these islands the nation, being compact and having a strong central government, instead of splitting into parties and being distracted by civil war, revolted altogether<sup>2</sup>. The King and Parliament acted in unison, and their action in transferring to the crown the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was so firm and decisive as to compel the assent of Convocation, of the Universities, and of the Cathedral bodies.
- v. The Change effected was very gradual in this country. For a time all went on as before. People repaired to the same Churches, used the same prayers, and conformed to the same customs as in times past, only there was no longer any recognition of the supremacy of the Pope<sup>3</sup>. Henry VIII. clung firmly to the old mediæval doctrines<sup>4</sup>, and though the Latin Service Books were

p. 167.

3 "It was the Church, not of Rome, but of England (Ecclesia Anglicana), of which the rights and liberties were declared inviolable by King John's Great Charter, confirmed by Henry the Third. It is the Holy Church of England (Scinte Eglise d'Engleterre), which, in the preamble to the Statute of Provisors of 23 Edward III. (A.D. 1350), was described "as founded in the estate of Prelacy, within the realm of England." The Papal encroachments, which the Statute was passed to restrain, were described as tending to 'the annullation of the Estate of the Holy Church of England'." Earl Selborne's Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment, pp. 9, 10, 3rd ed.

revised, and the Litany was put forth in English for public use, there was little progress in any doctrinal Reformation. The translation, however, of the Holy Scriptures, and their circulation during this monarch's reign, accompanied as they were by the general revival of learning, while they gave a great impetus to the new movement, stirred no little controversy and speculation in men's minds, accustomed as they had long been to turn for guidance to the decrees of the Roman See.

vi. The Danger. It was impossible, however, that so great a change in the attitude of the English Church towards the Roman See could be unattended with danger. For various conflicting opinions were at once put forth on matters of faith and doctrine, and every man claimed for himself the right of private judgment, and many not only abused it, but indulged too often in wild speculation and unauthorized practices. It was the natural wish, therefore, of several leaders in the new movement, that, following the example set in Germany, formal "Confessions" or "Articles of Faith" should be drawn up, which should put an end to these mischievous divisions, exhibit the actual struggle which had long been going on in this country, and the reassertion of the independence of the English National Church, an independence which had never been lost sight of since the days of the British Church, and indeed from the very commencement of the history of the Church in these islands. Before the Norman Conquest the English Church had yielded but a partial assent to the Pope's claim to be autocrat over all the Churches, and though the Norman dynasty fell in with the prevailing tone of subjection to Roman claims, William I. contended stoutly for his own eoclesiastical supremacy, and refused to do homage to the Pope for the realm of England, or to allow Papal Bulls to run in his kingdom. See Stubbs' Constitutional History, i. pp. 281, 285; Lord Selborne's Defence of the Church of England, p. 15. Henry II. by the Constitutions of Clarendon, A.D. 1164, strongly asserted the rights of the National Church of England. "King John in the first Article of Magna Charta declared that the Church of England should be free, and enjoy its whole rights and licenses inviolable. During the reign of Edward III. and Richard II. no less than six Acts of Parliament declared the interference of the Pope with the temporalities of the English Church to be illegal." See Lord Selborne's Defence, pp. 28—31; Aubrey Moore's History of the Reformation, pp. 35, 40.

tenets of those who had separated themselves from the Roman centre, and in some measure define their dogmatical position, as Rome herself did more exhaustively afterwards at the Council of Trent<sup>1</sup>.

1 "We did not at the Reformation start our career in separation from Rome by drawing up a formulated constitution, as did the American leaders at the Declaration of Independence. Our Articles do not treat exhaustively the whole field of Theology; they impose limits in some directions and define principles in others, but cannot be regarded as dealing in full with all the functions of the English Church." The Anglican Position, Article in "The Guardian," Jan. 10, 1894.

CHAPTER II.

The Augsburg Confession.

- i. The Schwabach Articles. One of the earliest occasions when the idea of presenting a defence of their Faith took actual shape amongst the Continental Reformers was in 1529. In this year a document was put forth known by the name of the "Schwabach Articles," so called from the Convent' where they were drawn up. They were seventeen in number, and were really a corrected copy of the text offered at Marburg to the Zwinglians, and refused by them<sup>2</sup> as too conservative and Lutheran in their tone.
- ii. The Augsburg Confession. The Schwabach Articles formed the groundwork of a still more important document, which, under the name of the "Augsburg Confession," was presented to the Emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg on the 25th of June 1530. It was drawn up by Melancthon in Latin and German, and was signed by John, the Elector of Saxony, George the Markgrave of Brandenburg, and other members of the Diet.
- iii. The Latin draft of this document was sent May II, 1530 to Luther, then in the Castle of Coburg on the Saxon frontier, with a request from the Elector of Saxony that he would read and revise it. His reply, dated May 15, was as follows:—"I have read over the Apology of Master Philip: it pleases me very well, and I know of nothing whereby I could better it or change it, nor would it be becoming, for I cannot tread so gently and softly. May Christ our Lord help, that it may bring forth much and great fruit, as we hope and pray. Amen¹." The doctrinal matter of this Confession was due to Luther, while Melancthon's scholarly and methodical mind elaborated it into its final shape and form, and breathed into it a moderate, conservative tone².

- iv. The Importance of this Confession does not consist in its completeness as a system of doctrine, to which it does not pretend, but in the fact that it formed an apologetic statement in reference to many points which were then in dispute, and also exercised a great influence in England. It was distinguished by a marked moderation of tone, and while it steered a middle path between the prevailing teaching and the new movements now in progress, it strove to preserve everything primitive and Catholic, and protested against modern distortions and innovations?
- v. Analysis. The Augsburg Confession consisted of two parts. The first part had reference to matters of faith; the second to those Roman abuses which were deemed most objectionable:—
  - (a) Part i. consisted of twenty-two Articles:—
    - (a) The first six Articles treated of the Trinity, Original Sin, the Incarnation, Life, Death,

3 Hardwick's Hist. Articles, p. 16.

Resurrection, and Ascension of our Lord, the Ministry of the Church, and the relation between Faith and Works;

- (b) The next eight Articles treated of the Church, Holy Baptism, the Holy Eucharist, Penance, the Use of the Sacraments, and Holy Orders;
- (c) The following seven Articles (i) vindicated the authority of the Civil Power, the lawfulness of war, property, and oaths; (ii) asserted the ancient doctrine of the Resurrection and the Final Judgment; (iii) dealt with free will, original sin, good works, and the invocation of saints.
- (β) Part ii. consisted of seven Articles:—
  They formed a kind of Appendix, and treated of certain abuses relating to (1) Communion in both kinds; (2) Clerical Celibacy;
  (3) Obligatory Confession; (4) the Mass;
  (5) ceremonial feasts and fasts; (6) monastic vows; (7) the secular power of the bishops¹.
- vi. Result. This rough analysis sufficiently proves how anxious the compilers of "the Apology," as they term it, were to keep as much as possible within the boundaries of the Western Church, and to diverge as little as possible from primitive and Catholic uses. The presentation of the document excited great discussion, and the moderate party found themselves unable to make head against the more violent Mediævalists. Finally it was agreed that till some general Council could be summoned, the Reformers should be directed to appoint no more married priests, to teach the duty of Confession, to allow the celebration of private Masses, and accept the validity of Communion in one kind. Thus all hopes of reconciliation were broken off, and the schemes of the more moderate of both parties were frustrated.

CHAPTER III.

The English Articles of 1536 and 1538.

- i. English movements. England, however, was not Germany and Henry VIII. was a very different person from Charles V. Four years after the Diet of Augsburg, all the steps had been taken by which the English Church threw off the supremacy of the Roman See, and it was not long before the King gave his attention to the subject of theology.
- ii. The Ten Articles. Accordingly in 1536 the Ten Articles were published, "devised by the king's highnesse majestie to stablyshe christen quietnes and unitie amonges us, and to avoyde contentious opinions." Of these Articles it is probable that a rough draft was made by a committee of the moderate divines of each party, presided over by the King himself, or placed in frequent communication with him, and that this draft, after various modifications subsequently made, was submitted to the Upper House of Convocation for further criticism. The compilers of these Articles having stated their object to be the establish-to Rome from the English Courts. In 1534 Convocation, the Parliament of the Church, decided that the Popes had no more right given them by God over the kingdom than any other foreign bishop. These acts simply reclaimed the ancient independence of the English State and the English Church. See Lord Selborne's Defence, pp. 28—31.

The first steps taken towards a separation from Rome were taken in a constitutional manner. In 1730 an Act of Parliament was passed, which forbade an application to Rome for dispensations from certain English Laws. In 1531 all money payments claimed by the Roman see were forbidden to be paid any more. In 1533 a third Act was passed forbidding any appeal

ment of charitable concord and unity, proceed to draw a distinction between such things as are expressly commanded by God, and are necessary to salvation, and such things as, though not expressly commanded by God nor necessary to salvation, should yet be preserved:—

- (i) The things necessary to be believed are
  - (α) The grounds of Faith, viz. the Bible, the three Creeds, the Four Holy Councils, and the Traditions of the Fathers which are not contrary to God's word;
  - (β) The Sacrament of Baptism, the Sacrament of Penance, the Sacrament of the Altar, Justification.
- (ii) The things to be retained though not necessary to salvation are Veneration of Images, Honour due unto Saints, Praying to Saints, Rites and Ceremonies, Purgatory.

iii. Their Features. The Ten Articles testify to a compromise between the champions of the Old and the New Learning<sup>1</sup>. They represent a transition period, and embody the ideas of men who were gradually emerging into a different sphere of thought, and reflect the essential tenets of the Mediæval School, simply substituting the Royal for the Papal Supremacy. They were in many ways extremely well calculated for the guidance of the Clergy in the instruction of the people<sup>2</sup>. This early set of Articles, however, was received with the greatest hostility in the North, and the disaffected of all classes flew to arms in vindication of the ancient system. It was virtually superseded in the next year, 1537, by the "Institution of a

Christian Man<sup>1</sup>," and was eventually supplanted by the "Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man," or the "King's Book" set forth in 1543.

- iv. The Conferences. Two years after the promulgation of the Ten Articles, or 1538, a deputation of three German divines<sup>2</sup> came over to this country, and by order of Henry VIII. many conferences took place between them and a select committee of English theologians headed by Cranmer. The result was the compilation of Thirteen Articles on some of the leading points of the Christian Faith. This manifesto is of special interest as supplying the groundwork of the Articles now in use.
- v. The Thirteen Articles were discovered in their collected form by Dr Jenkyns among the MSS. of Archbishop Cranmer in the State Paper Office<sup>8</sup>. They treat of the Unity of God and the Trinity<sup>4</sup>, Original Sin<sup>5</sup>, the Two Natures of Christ<sup>6</sup>, Justification<sup>7</sup>, the Church<sup>8</sup>, Baptism, the Eucharist, Penance, the Use of the Sacraments<sup>9</sup>, the "Burckhardt was the head of the legation and bore with him a commendatory letter to King Henry, dated May 12, 1538." Hardwick, Articles, p. 56.

<sup>8</sup> This Article includes the 23rd and the 24th of the Edwardine Series, but uses language in both cases not found in the Augsburg Confession.

9 Its language is almost identical with the 29th of the xlii. Articles. Ministers of the Church, Ecclesiastical Rites, Civil Affairs, the Resurrection, and Final Judgment.

vi. The Six Articles. Interesting, however, as it is to notice the relation of these Articles to the subsequent series, the discussions between the foreign and English theologians roused the polemical spirit of Henry VIII., who was determined to maintain Communion in one kind, private Masses, and the celibacy of the Clergy<sup>1</sup>. Consequently the Conferences were broken off, and the King not only issued a proclamation denouncing penalties against married priests, but under the influence of Bishop Gardiner promulgated the Six Articles Law in 15392. These Articles are important as representing the farthest point to which the reaction in this monarch's reign extended, and a serious attempt to enforce by terrible penalties3 religious doctrine as part of the Statute Law. They enforced (i) a belief in Transubstantiation; (ii) the sufficiency of Communion in one kind; (iii) Clerical celibacy; (iv) the obligation of vows of chastity: (v) the use and efficacy of private Masses; (vi) the obligation of the Sacrament of Penance.

These Articles were first resolved by Convocation, and then accepted by Parliament. Hardwick's Refor- mation, p. 189.

<sup>3</sup> Those who wrote, spoke, or preached against the first Article were to be burned as heretics "without any abjuration." Those who preached or obstinately disputed against the others were to be hanged as felons. Those who spoke against them in any way were to be imprisoned. Married priests were to be separated from their wives; if they returned to them they were to be hanged as felons, and their wives were to suffer in like manner. Those who abstained from Communion in one kind or from the Sacrament of Penance were for the first offence to forfeit their goods and be imprisoned; for the second to suffer as felons. Perry's Reformation, pp. 52, 53. The Act was repealed by I Edw. VI. 12. "The principle of making heresy an offence against the Common Law as against the Canon Law had been propounded in England so early as A.D. 1406." Comp. Stubbs, Constit. Hist. iii. p. 362. Ed. 1878.

CHAPTER IV.

The Articles in the reign of Edward VI.

- i. Accession of Edward VI. The death of Henry VIII. in 1547 at once removed the influences which made for a more conservative solution of the religious problem than was pleasing to the German Reformers. The sentiments of the late King had always finally rejected the proposals of the Protestant reactionaries. But neither the child of Jane Seymour nor the Protector Somerset had any such prejudices. Now at last Cranmer's hand was free. Under the pretext of testing the orthodoxy of preachers and lecturers, he issued in 1549 a Book of Articles for circulation in the Southern Province1. The opinions and conduct of the extremists gave trouble and the Bishops were already calling for the maintenance of the jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Canon Law2.
- ii. Need of New Articles. But before long Cranmer saw that something more was needed to secure an adequate amount of harmony amongst preachers, lecturers, and others, and in 1551 he was directed by the King and Council to frame a body of Articles, which should be more developed than those he had already drawn up. This quite fell in with the Primate's earnest desire that a Confession of Faith, set forth by authority, should state the doctrines of the Church of England as against the Canons then being fashioned at Trent.

iii. Their Compilation. Accordingly the task was undertaken and busily prosecuted during the year 1551. Drafts of Articles drawn up by Cranmer and Ridley were forwarded for their consideration to such bishops and divines as it was thought could be trusted for the work. They remained in their hands till the spring of the following year, 1552, when the Council requested that the draft of the Confession might be laid before them<sup>1</sup>. This was done, and the Articles were then returned to the Archbishop, who after adding titles and some supplementary clauses submitted them to the king?. Edward VI. gave them for review to six chaplains, who sent them again to the Archbishop with some suggestions for "the last corrections of his judgment and his pen." The Primate remitted them after review to the Council, and it seems probable that they were submitted to Convocation in March 1553. Whether they received the formal sanction of Convocation is a matter of dispute<sup>3</sup>, but in compliance with Cranmer's wish it seems that a mandate was issued June 19, 1553, in the name of the king, requiring that the

3 Writing to Bullinger, Sir John Cheke says of the king, 'Nuper Articulos Synodi Londinensis promulgavit.'

John Clement, a martyr in the Marian persecution, says in his Confession, "I do accept, believe, and allow, for a very truth all the godly Articles that were agreed upon in the Convocation House, and published by the King's Majesty's authority, in the last year of his most gracious reign." Strype, Eccl. Memorials, iii. App. 215. On this vexed question see Hardwick, Hist. Articles, pp. 106—112; Dixon, iii. 513 sqq. holds that they had no Synodical authority. Tierney in Dodd, Church Hist. of England, ii. p. 58 states that on October 20th, 1553, "the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury, with only five dissentients, signed a paper denying that the Articles set forth in the late reign had received the sanction of that body," basing his statement on Foxe, Acts and Monuments, iii. p. 16.

new form should be publicly subscribed, and in the few remaining days of Edward's reign the order was apparently obeyed, at least to some extent, in two or three dioceses of the realm.

iv. The Articles thus issued were Forty-two in number, and when compared with the present Thirty-nine we notice that they exhibit certain additions and certain omissions:—

(a) Certain Additions:—

An important supplementary clause in the Third Article respecting the preaching of Christ in Hades; (ii) An Article on Grace1; (iii) An Article on Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost2; (iv) An Article stating that "all men are bound to keep the moral commandments of the Law"3; (v) An important clause in the 20th Article respecting the Holy Eucharist; (vi) Four Articles, xxxixxlii, setting forth that (a) the resurrection of the dead has not yet been brought to pass, (b) the souls of the departed neither die with their bodies, nor sleep idly, (c) the teaching of the Millenarii cannot be accepted, (d) all men shall not be saved in the end.

(b) Certain Omissions:-

(i) The present Fifth Article respecting the Holy Ghost; (ii) the Catalogue of the Canonical Books attached to the 6th Article; (iii) the present 12th Article on "Good Works"; (iv) the present 29th, "Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the Use of the Lord's Supper"; (v) the present 30th Article respecting Communion in both kinds; (vi) the Catalogue of the second Book of Homilies as given in Article xxxv.

v. Death of Edward VI. But before the new Manifesto, thus drawn up and issued, could be adequately discussed by the Clergy, Edward VI., who had long been ailing, passed away on the 6th of July, 1553<sup>1</sup>. Thus the very year, which witnessed the publication of this body of Articles, witnessed also their practical abrogation, for the accession of Mary put an end to the hopes both of the moderate men of the New Learning and of the party which favoured foreign methods of reform<sup>2</sup>.

CHAPTER V.

The Articles in the reign of Elizabeth.

- i. The Accession of Elizabeth revived the hopes of the Reformers, but it was some time before the subject of the Articles was taken in hand, and for the first four years of the new reign there was no doctrinal standard for the English Church beyond that which was contained in the Prayer Book. The fact was the Queen far more earnestly desired to re-establish the Service Book and enforce discipline, than to put forth any sharp delimitations of doctrine, which would shut out the more moderate section of the Roman party, whom she desired to include within the Church.
- ii. The Eleven Articles. During the interval, however, the Bishops found it necessary to put forth a short form, contained in Eleven Articles, which were to be accepted by the Clergy, and publicly professed by them not only on admission to their benefices, but also read twice every year after the Gospel for the day<sup>1</sup>. They were compiled in 1559 or early in 1560 under the eye of Archbishop Parker, and received the sanction of the Northern Metropolitan, and most of the other English prelates. But they had no legal or binding character, and were not ratified by the Queen, though in 1566 they were legalized for the

Church of Ireland, and constituted the sole formulary of that Church till 1615.

- Revision of the Forty-two Articles. At length it was proposed to reconsider the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI., on the assembling of the first Elizabethan Convocation in January 1562. Already before it met, Parker had been busy upon them, and had been assisted by several of his brother prelates, and especially by Bishop Cox of Ely, and Guest, now Bishop of Rochester. They took the Latin Articles of 1553 as the basis of their revision, and the results of their preliminary criticisms are preserved in the Parker MSS. now in the Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. In order to provide further material for the purpose Parker, instead of consulting the Swiss Confessions, which favoured the views of the more extreme Marian exiles2, had recourse to the Confession of Würtemberg, which had been presented to the Council of Trent in 1552 by the ambassadors of that State.
- iv. The Effect of this searching criticism by the Primate and his colleagues was
  - (i) To add Four Articles, viz.
    - Of the Holy Ghost (v); (2) Of Good Works (xii); (3) Of the Wicked which do not eat the Body of Christ (xxix); (4) Of Communion in both kinds (xxx):—
  - (ii) To take away an equal number:
    - (1) The Article on Grace (x); (2) that on Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (xvi); (3) that to the effect that all men are bound to keep the moral Commandments of the Law (xix), which was now incorporated into Article vii.; (4) that concerning Heretics called Millenarii (xli):-

- (iii) To modify by partial amplification or curtailment as many as seventeen of the remainder.
- v. Adoption by Convocation. The Synod of Canterbury began to consider the Articles on Jan. 19. 1563. As first presented to this body they were, by reason of the balance in previous changes, still forty-two in number. But on the 20th of the month, the date of the Episcopal subscriptions, three were erased. These were the 39th, 40th, and 42nd of the series of 1552, which related to various Anabaptist theories2. The whole number was now reduced to Thirty-nine, and in this form the document was sent down to the Lower House. Here, after some delay, it was subscribed by the majority, and forwarded to the Queen for ratification.
- vi. The Queen's Ratification. It was some time before this was given. When, however, the Latin copy with the ratification was issued from the Royal Press the Twenty-ninth Article relating to "Unworthy participation of the Eucharist" was found wanting, and the clause affirming that "the Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of Faith," appeared at the commencement of the Twentieth Article. A grace ex opere operato.

great dispute has arisen about this clause. In the English copy of the Articles, which was printed soon after the Latin copy was issued bearing the Queen's ratification, it does not appear. This change was probably introduced as a concession on the part of the Queen to the scruples of the extremists. For the time the number of the Articles was reduced to Thirty-eight.

vii. The revision of 1571. In 1566, when the vestment controversy had reached its highest point, an attempt was made in Parliament to carry an Act making subscription to the Articles binding on all the Clergy. The Copy specified in the Bill was the English Version of 1563, which lacked the clause in the Twentieth Article inserted by the Queen, and also the Twenty-ninth Article. Whatever was the cause, whether it was the omission of the clause which she favoured, or her great dislike to any interference by Parliament in matters of religion, certain it is that the Bill, having passed the Commons, was abruptly "stayed" by the Queen's command in the House of Lords<sup>2</sup>. This greatly annoyed the Bishops, and they in vain remonstrated. It was not till May 1571 that an Act was passed by both Houses of Parliament and received the Royal assent, which enacted that all the Clergy shall before Christmas next, in the presence of their Ordinaries, subscribe the Book of the Articles of Religion. They were now carefully revised in Convocation. The clause inserted in the Twentieth Article was now accepted3, and the Twenty-ninth having been restored, they were in this form subscribed, while the revision of the English edition<sup>1</sup> was entrusted to Bishop Jewel. The shape given to them by Jewel is that which has been retained ever since, and the Ratification<sup>2</sup> still subjoined in our Prayer Books is the same as that which was put forth in the reign of Elizabeth.

As regards the English and Latin versions, the words of Waterland are important:—"I might justly say," he writes, "with Bishop Burnet, that the Latin and English are both equally authentical. Thus much, however, I maycertainly infer, that if in any places the English version be ambiguous, where the Latin original is clear and determinate, the Latin ought to fix the more doubtful sense of the other (as also vice versa), it being eviden that the Convocation, Queen, and Parliament intended the same sense in both."

2 From this Ratification we learn (i) that the Articles are "allowed to be holden and executed within the Realme," by the assent and consent of the Queen, (ii) that they were deliberately read, and confirmed, and subscribed by the Archbishops and Bishops of the Upper House, (iii) that they were subscribed by the whole clergy of the Nether House in their Convocation, in the year of our Lord, 1571.

GROUP I.

ARTICLES 1-5.

The Articles in this group relate to God as He has revealed Himself to us.

They treat of

- (a) The essential attributes of God and His mode of existence in three Persons, or the mystery of the Trinity in Unity (Art. i.);
- $(\beta)$  The nature and work of the Son of God:
  - (1) His Life and Ministry on Earth, including His Incarnation, Passion, and Sacrifice upon the Cross (Art. ii.);
  - (2) His descent into Hades (Art. iii.);
  - (3) His Resurrection, Ascension, and Future Coming to Judgment (Art. iv.);
- ( $\gamma$ ) The Deity and Personality of the Holy Ghost (Art. v.).

ARTICLE I.

De fide in Sanctam Trinitatem.

Vnvs est viuus et uerus Deus, æternus, incorporeus, impartibilis, impassibilis, immensæ potentiæ, sapientiæ ac bonitatis: creator et conseruator omnium tum uisibilium tum inuisibilium. Et in Vnitate huius diuinæ naturæ tres sunt Personæ, eiusdem essentiæ, potentiæ, ac æternitatis, Pater, Filius, et Spiritus sanctus.

Of fayth in the holy Trinitie.

There is but one lyuyng and true God, euerlastyng, without body, partes, or passions, of infinite power, wysdome, and goodnesse, the maker and preseruer of al things both visible and inuisible. And in vnitie of this Godhead there be three persons, of one substaunce, power, and eternitie, the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost.

- i. Subject. The first Five Articles, as we have seen, treat of the Fundamental Doctrines of the Catholic Faith. Of these the first relates to the Holy Trinity, and the Title has remained uniform in Latin and English since 1553.
- ii. Source. The source of the Article is the corresponding First Article of the Augsburg Confession<sup>1</sup>, derived apparently through the medium of the Thirteen Articles of 1538. The language has suffered no material alteration since the first draft.
- 1 Compare the words of the First Article of the Augsburg Confession: "De Unitate Essentiæ Divinæ et de Tribus Personis, censemus decretum Nicenæ Synodi verum, et sine ulla dubitatione credendum esse, videlicet, quod sit una Essentia Divina, quæ et appellatur et est Deus, æternus, incorporeus, impartibilis, immenså potentiâ, sapientiâ, bonitate, Creator et Conservator omnium rerum visibilium et invisibilium, et tamen tres sint Personæ ejusdem essentiæ et potentiæ, et coæternæ, Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus." Comp. also the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, De Summâ Trinitate, c. 2.

- iii. Object. The object of the Article is to defend the doctrine of the Trinity against unbelievers, Polytheists and Pantheists<sup>1</sup>, and against all, who, under the disguise of Anabaptists, were reviving in the sixteenth century some of the chief errors of Arianism, Sabellianism, and kindred heresies
- iv. Analysis. The Article may be divided into two parts:—
  - (I) It treats of the existence, unity and attributes of God;
  - (2) It states the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity in Unity.

PART I.

The Existence of God.

- v. The Existence of God. This, the fundamental conception of religion, the Article postulates on Scriptural grounds. He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that seek after Him (Heb. xi. 6). Ex hypothesi it is impossible for finite beings to demonstrate the existence of the Infinite God in such a way as to admit of no contradiction. Indeed, were it possible, it would involve the exclusion of faith, and of the moral qualities which are inseparable from faith. The evidence, however, of His existence, which comes from several different and independent sources, may be arranged as follows:—
  - (I) The Evidence of Consciousness:—The idea of the Infinite is implicit in the human mind; it seems to be universal and permanent, at least in civilized man. The most ordinary and fundamental ideas, those, for instance, of time, space, growth, and the like presuppose the existence of a Being superior to time or space. "The soul does not willingly consent to regard so inspiring a conception as a mere thought. To consider it as unreal, with no counterpart in the realm of actual existence, is felt as a bereavement and a pain<sup>1</sup>." Man cannot help thinking of God. "He learns to pray before he learns to reason<sup>2</sup>." In fact, he personifies the Infinite.

(2) The Evidence of General Consent:—There is no age so distant, no country so remote, no people so barbarous, but it has recognized, in one form or another, the existence of Some Thing or Some One greater than nature or man. This is a spiritual fact, running through the entire history of the human race in all ages, and it is impossible to conceive that this universal belief points to no objective reality. We trace the conviction of the being of One, Who is the Foundation of all existence, in the Vedic<sup>3</sup> and on the Socialist Bill, Oct. 1878, Prince Bismarck is reported to have said that "he would not desire to live a day longer, if he had not what Schiller calls the 'belief in God and a better future'." Ibid. p. 36, n. Even Cicero speaks of "insitas Deorum, vel potius innatas cognitiones," as holding their place in the background of all hearts, De Nat. Deorum, i. 17. 44, and see Christlieb, Modern Doubt and Christian Belief, p. 141. Transl., Edinburgh, 1874.

Zoroastrian<sup>1</sup> systems, in those of Greece and Rome<sup>2</sup>, in that of Confucius<sup>3</sup>, in the religion of ancient Egypt<sup>4</sup>, as well as in those of the Kaffir and Zulu races and the tribes of Central Africa, amongst the lowest as well as the highest races of mankind<sup>5</sup>.

(3) The Evidence of Nature. The feeling of man, common alike to the child and to the scientist, in the presence of Nature is one of wonder. Such wonder is, if not the basis of, at least closely allied to religious awe. But Nature does more than thus impress us; she invites us these individual gods is invoked, they are not conceived as limited by the powers of others, as superior or inferior in rank. Each god is to the mind of the supplicant as good as all gods. 1 "The Duad, with the Monad brooding behind it," as has most truly been said, "is the fundamental principle of the Avesta, and of the old and once wide-spread faith that is set forth in its venerable Hymns." Bp Ellicott's The Being of God, p. 36. For Bishop Butler's reference to "the general consent of mankind," see Analogy, Introduction, i. p. 7.

"Even through the vista of the mixed deities of the pantheon of Rome, half national and half utilitarian, we just catch sight of one supreme and ultimate Being, a Jupiter Optimus-Maximus of whom all other deities were but the manifestations and attributes." Ibid. p. 37.

<sup>4</sup> In ancient Egypt I AM THAT I AM appears, almost beyond doubt, to have been the object of esoteric worship which was taught to the initiated. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, pp. 242, 251. On the avowedly atheistic feature of Buddhism, see Bp Ellicott's Being of God, pp. 40, 41; Prof. Flint's Antitheistic Theories, p. 282 sq.

5 "The result of my investigation," says De Quatrefages, "is this: Obliged, in my course of instruction, to review all human races, I have sought atheism in the lowest as well as in the highest. I have nowhere met with it, except in individuals or in more or less limited schools, such as those which existed in Europe in the last century, or which may still be seen at the present day." The Human Species, p. 482 (E. Transl.).

"The mysteries of the Church are child's play compared with the mysteries of nature. The doctrine of the Trinity is not more puzzling than the necessary antinomies of physical speculation; virgin procreation, and resuscitation from apparent death, are ordinary phenomena for the naturalist." Huxley, Letter to the late Dean of Wells, quoted in Gore's Bampton Lectures, pp. 246, 247.

both to trace her to her source, and to investigate her special purposes and her general end. Causation leads the enquirer to the limit of the ken of science, where he is left in the presence of the Great Unknown. We trace effects back to their causes; but these causes are found to be also effects. The path is endless. There is no goal. There is no rest or satisfaction, save in the assumption of the existence of a "Causa Causans," a supreme First Cause, itself more exalted than all, and therefore self-existent and eternal, and which can be no inert or formless matter.

(4) The Evidence of Mind. When we attend to the various objects of which we take cognizance in the world of nature, we discover something more than the properties, which distinguish them one from another, and the causes which bring them into being. In the process of investigation we are struck with the fact that there is a co-operation of causes for the pro-

Lectures on Heroes, Lect. VI. p. 385. "I had rather believe all the fables in the Legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind." Bacon's Essays, Atheism, ad init. For Scriptural statements of the knowledge of God as derived from Nature, see Psalm xix. 1; Isai. xlv. 18; Acts xiv. 15—17; Rom. i. 19, 20.

<sup>2</sup> Flint's Theism, pp. 118—124. <sup>3</sup> "No one has ever yet built up one particle of living matter out of lifeless elements; every living creature, from the simplest dweller on the confines of organization up to the highest and most complete, has its origin in pre-existent living matter." Prof. Allman, Address to British Association.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;There is an absurdity involved in the idea of an endless regress, of an infinite series, in the succession of whose limits no causal energy, or cause answerable to the demand of reason, is contained." Prof. Fisher, Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief, p. 42. "Napoleon's savants, Bourrienne tells us, in that voyage to Egypt, were one evening busily occupied arguing that there could be no God. They had proved it, to their satisfaction, by all manner of logic. Napoleon, looking up into the stars, answers, 'Very ingenious, Messieurs; but who made all that?' The Atheistic logic runs off from him like water; the great Fact stares him in the face, 'Who made all that?'" Carlyle's duction of definite effects<sup>1</sup>. The relation of means to ends is adjusted with a nicety of calculation, an economy of force, which command the deepest reverence. Everything tells; there is no waste; no lost labour; no extravagant haste. The poor word "design" fails to convey the impression which is made upon us: it faintly adumbrates what we feel. "We see a thought realised and thus recognize in it a fore-thought2." The observation of order and adaptation in nature inspires the conviction of an Infinite Mind concerned in its origination3, which possesses the full intelligence of all these adaptations to definite ends, and is itself the Supreme Cause of all<sup>5</sup>.

1 See Ebrard's Christian Apologetics, Vol. i. pp. 170-172. English Translation, 1886.

2 "This thought has impressed the philosopher and the peasant alike. Socrates enforced the argument by the illustration of a statue, as Paley, two thousand years later, by the illustration of a watch." Prof. Fisher, Grounds of Belief, p. 43. See Flint's Theism, Lec. v., vi.; Liddon's Some Elements, pp. 53-55; Mozley's Essays, Vol. ii. pp. 363-413.

3 "When we see a purpose carried out, we are impelled to trace the operation to an intelligent Author, whether the end is obtained by an agency acting from within or from without. The accurate mathematics of the planetary bodies, marking out for themselves their orbits, the unerring path of the birds, the geometry of the bee, the seed-corn sending upward the blossoming and fruit-bearing stalk, excite a wonder, the secret of which is the insufficiency of the operative cause to effect these marvels of intelligence and foresight." See Bp Ellicott's Being of God, pp. 84-111.

4 "Science will not allow us to say that things made themselves, or are their own causes. The only alternative is that they were made by some external power, and any power which could contrive and execute all the complex machinery of the heavens and the earth, or could initiate anything capable of developing such machinery, must be practically infinite and must possess those attributes of superhuman power and superhuman wisdom which belong only to God." Sir William Dawson, Present Day Tracts, vii. 5; Martensen's Christian

The Psalmist says (xciv. 9), "He that made the ear, shall He not hear? And He that made the eye, shall He not see?" Why not add? "He that made the mind shall He not think?" Liddon's Some Elements, p. 53. Scientific study favours the view that matter itself is an effect. If we accept the hypothesis of molecules as the ultimate forms of matter, Sir John Herschel finds in each of these, as related to the others, "the essential qualities of a manufactured article."

- The Evidence of Conscience. Conscience is man's (5)faculty of knowing, as it were in the presence of a Supreme Judge, his own relation towards the moral law1. Every man has a voice within him, which says to him, "This is right, this is wrong"; "This is your duty, this is not your duty." "This voice within gives no proof, appeals to no evidence, but speaks as having a right to command, and requires of a man his obedience by virtue of its own inherent superiority2." Now it is impossible to dissociate this mysterious Voice, which utters "the moral imperative" within the soul<sup>3</sup>, from the Being of all beings, the supreme Vindicator of the moral Law, to whom we stand in a personal relation, and who has a claim upon the obedience of us all4
- (6) The Argument from History:—At first sight nothing is more intricate and anomalous than the history of the different nations of the earth.

1 "Every man bears in himself the ethical law as a determinateness of his peculiar essence...In the ethical law the personal, holy God gives practical proof of Himself as One addressing Himself to the will of man." Ebrard's Apologetics, Eng. Trans. i. p. 250. Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p. 6. E. T.

"matrics, p. 6, E. T.

2 See Bp Temple's Bampton Lectures, p. 47. "Conscience is no descendant of our will or our reason. It is no product of our own mind. It is the product of a moral spirit above and beyond ourselves, whose voice speaks to us through conscience." Luthardt's Fundamental Truths, p.

3 Butler, in his Sermons on Human Nature, says of the conscience, "Had it the power as it has manifest authority, it would absolutely govern the world." But authority presupposes power. The conscience has authority because it witnesses to a law, a purpose, of One Who has the power upon which its own authority must rest. Strong's Syst. Theol., p. 46; Liddon's Some Elements, pp. 66—70.

4 "Ethical enquiry, where it is true to its subject matter, postulates an absolute and superhuman law of righteousness, with which men are as truly brought into relation through conscience, as they are, through the eye, into relation to the objective reality of light"; Gore, Bampton Lectures, p. 31; see also Liddon, Some Elements of Religion, pp. 69, 71.

It seems at first an inextricable coil of men and actions. Then it seems a constant recurrence of the same events under different forms. But he that hath eyes to see and ears to hear will recognize that there are a providential order and a moral order within it1. Righteousness exalteth a nation, and some find in human history a continual progress<sup>2</sup>. The history of social life, of nations, crime, law, and religion, supplies abundant evidence of this. But a moral government of the world and an education of the human race imply a moral Governor and Educator. For an unconscious government, an unconscious education of the human race according to moral laws, is a contradiction in terms, a simple impossibility3.

vi. The Force of the arguments thus advanced for the existence of God is cumulative, and sufficient to produce in any unprejudiced mind a moral certainty that He exists<sup>4</sup>. They do not originate our faith in His existence. They justify it, and lead us to infer that our worship is due to God, and that our lives must be conformed to His will, however made known<sup>5</sup>.

Flint's Theism, pp. 227—26t.

The evidences of physical and moral disorder in the world do not destroy the force of this argument; for (a) the most they can be said to prove is that the complete fulfilment of God's design has not yet been attained; (b) whatever may be the nature and origin of evil, it does not defeat the continual moral progress of the world; (c) there are abundant indications that God so overrules the forces of evil that He makes them instruments in accomplishing His own good designs. See Butler's Analogy, Pt i. chap. vii.

The Unity of God.

vii. The Unity of God. Belief in the existence of God implies a belief also in His Unity, as testified by the Nicene and other Eastern Creeds. If we rest our rational belief in the being of God upon the idea of cause, and speak of the necessity of conceiving an origin for the physical universe and for all phenomena, it is self-evident that we must needs conceive of only One cause. The idea of two first causes, self-existent and supreme, involves a manifest contradiction. The unity of God means the absolute distinction of His being1, as original and independent and self-existing, from all other being. All other being must be regarded as dependent upon and derived from Him. He alone is "the life that is life indeed," self-originating and self-sufficing. He is the "Vigor tenax rerum," the end and origin of all things2. The Unity of God is constantly and expressly affirmed in Holy Scripture, and was the great doctrine which Moses delivered to the Israelites:-

- (a) Hear, O Israel, he saith, the Lord our God, the Lord is One (Deut. vi. 4, R.V. Marg.);
- (β) The Lord He is God; there is none else beside Him (Deut. iv. 35);
  - (γ) This is the life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God (John xvii. 3);

omnium conscientia agnosset, Deum summum esse magnum...si fuerit aliud summum magnum, adæquabitur, et si adæquabitur, non erit jam summum magnum." Tertullian adv. Marcion i. 3.

(δ) We know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one (1 Cor. viii. 4)¹.

The Unity of God, that which other religions were feeling after and tending towards<sup>2</sup>, stands out clearly and distinctly as the characteristic of the religion of Israel, and is fearlessly claimed as an inheritance from the patriarchal age.

The Attributes of God.

- viii. Connection. Having spoken of God as One, the Article proceeds to deal with His attributes:—and it states,
  - (i) That He is "living," "true," "eternal";
    - (a) Living, "Vivus." He is not simply vivens, but vivus, the source of life, the only efficient principle, to Whom all things owe their existence<sup>3</sup>.

1 The Unity of God thus set before us is not numerical, but universal. "Deus, cum unus dicitur, unus, non numeri sed universitatis vocabulo nuncupatur, id est, qui propterea unus dicitur quod alius non sit." Rufinus in Symb. Apost. c. 5. But there is also an integral unity in the Divine Being, which is more properly described as an attribute. Both senses of the term are referred to by Moses Maimonides thus: "God is one, not two, or more than two, but only one; whose unity is not like that of the individuals of this world; neither is it one by way of species, comprehending many individuals; neither one in the manner of a body which is divisible into parts and extremes; but in one, as no unity like His is to be found in the world.

See the passage quoted by Bp Pearson on the Creed, Art. i.; Bp of Carlisle's Foundations of the Creed, p. 39.

<sup>2</sup> For the way in which the traditional polytheism was challenged in Greece by Plato and Xenophon, see Lux Mundi, pp. 69, 70, and the passages quoted from The Republic, pp. 377—385; Theaet. 176, C.

<sup>3</sup> Vivus denotes that God is the  $\pi\eta\gamma\dot{\eta}$  ζω $\dot{\eta}$ s, the source of life, Fons et Origo Vitæ, or, as He is called in Scripture, Θεδε ζων, "the God who lives." Comp. Acts xiv. 15; Rom. ix. 26; 2 Cor. iii. 3; vi. 16; 1 Thess. i. 9; 1 Tim. iii. 15; Heb. iii. 12, and observe in each passage the emphasis laid upon the participle, whether by position or otherwise. See S. Thom. Summ. Theol. i. 18.

- (β) True, "Verus'," for He is the one real, absolute God, in opposition to the unreal, false gods of heathenism, who have no substantial existence:
- (y) Eternal, "Æternus," standing, by the necessity of His Being, outside the limitations of time, whether à parte ante or à parte post2. He is the one eternal "Now," from everlasting to everlasting<sup>3</sup> (Ps. xc. 2).
- (ii) That He is "without body, parts, or passions":—
  - (a) Without body, "incorporeus4." We are apt to think of God in terms of human understanding, to acquire the habit of regarding Him as "a magnified, non-natural man." The limitations of the material, as we know it, are not in Him. He transcends them (John iv. 24)5.
  - (B) Without parts6, "impartibilis," for in Him

1 Verus, ἀληθινός, not verax, ἀληθής. For the difference between the two words see Introduction to the Creeds. p. 83, n. For the application of the word to God see Joh. xvii. 3; τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν; 1 Thess. i. 9, θεῷ ζῶντι καὶ ἀληθινῷ; 1 Joh. v. 20, οῦτός ἐστιν ὁ ἀληθινὸς θεός.

<sup>2</sup> Time is a relation of created things and of finite events. When of things, it expresses their duration: when of events, it is the measure of their succession. But Divine eternity is an idea which transcends duration, and excludes all but logical succession. The Schoolmen describe it as "Interminabilis vitæ tota simul et perfecta possessio." S. Thos. i. 10 C.

3 In the correct sense the Eternal is the supra-temporal, it is that which is without change and without succession; for time is the measure of change. As time is a fleeting Now that ever eludes our grasp, so eternity is a stationary Now, that is constantly present and constantly invariable. And this necessary association between the variable and the temporal leads us to conceive of the eternal God as the abiding and the real, and of the life of God as the Life which really is, "the Life which is Life indeed." "Fuisse et futurum esse non est in ea (vita divina), sed esse solum, quoniam æterna est. Nam fuisse et futurum esse non est æter-num." S. Aug. Conf. ix. 10. 24. <sup>4</sup> Incorporeus. The word occurs

there is nothing which violates the integral unity of His being. It is ever one and the same God Who fulfils Himself by divers portions and in divers manners1.

- (γ) Without passions, "impassibilis." He is not subject, like man, to varying emotions which affect His orderly conduct of the universe2. In Numb, xxiii. 19 we read, God is not a man that He should lie, nor the son of man that He should repent; and again, Mal. iii, 6. He Himself says, I am the Lord, I change not; and S. James describes Him as the Father of Lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning (Jas. i. 17)3.
- (iii) That He is "of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness."
  - (a) Of infinite power, "immensæ potentiæ," for

1 "God is one in the simplest and strictest sense...as truly one as any individual soul or spirit is one; nay infinitely more so, for all creatures are imperfect, and He has all perfection." Newman, Par. Sermons, vi. 348.

Impassibilis, from in and patior. The word is not found in Latin classical writers. It occurs only in ecclesiastical Latin. Thus Tertull.

Apol. 10, "Deus impassibilis." For the use of the term in the Creed of Aquileia, comp. Introd. to the Creeds, pp. 21, 22.

3 Scripture, however, justifies the ascription to God of such feelings as anger, jealousy, and the like, because such language is the only means of expressing to us that disturbance in the operation of the Divine attributes which is caused by sin. On the other hand, Scripture tells us that God is Love, but the attribute referred to as Love is something very different from the human emotion, for it is the very Divine Essence itself eternally operative between the Sacred Persons of the Blessed Trinity. His Love is that passionless and changeless movement of His essence, whereby Hedesires to gather into union with Himself all who are good. S. Thomas Summ. Th. i. 20; Martensen's Dogmatics, § 51; Mason's Faith of the Gospel, pp. 39, 40. Thus S. Augustine, commenting on the expression τοῦ Υίου της ἀγάπης Aurou, says, "Charitas quippe Patris quæ in Natura Ejus est ineffabiliter simplici, nihil est aliud quam Ejus ipsa Natura atque Substantia." S. Aug. de Trinit. xv. 19. 37.

4 Immensus, from in and metior= immeasurable, boundless. Cp. Cic. De Nat. Deor. i. 10. 26, "Aëra deum statuit eumque gigni esseque immensum et infinitum." The moral limitations to the Divine Power are well put by S. Augustine; "Deus omnipotens est, et cum sit omnipotens, mori non potest,

GROUP I.

He is Almighty, and can do all things that do not imply imperfection and that consist with His Attributes, so that none can stay His Hand or say unto Him, What doest Thou? (Job xlii. 2; Dan. iv. 35). His omnipotence is thus self-limited by the very fact of its perfection. "Omnis potestas sequitur voluntatem." All true power is will-power, and the Divine Will is absolutely good<sup>1</sup>.

- Of infinite wisdom, "sapientiæ." No mere  $(\beta)$ quiescent attribute. Attingit ergo a fine usque ad finem fortiter, et disponit omnia suaviter (Sap. viii. 1). Prudence has been defined as choosing the best means to a certain end; Wisdom as choosing the best means to the best end. Now God alone knows what is the best end: He is the only wise God2 (Rom. xvi. 27), and as the Psalmist says, great is His Power, yea and His wisdom is infinite (Ps. cxlvii. 5). His wisdom, according to the teaching of S. Paul. is markedly exemplified by the economy of Redemption<sup>8</sup>.
- (y) Of infinite goodness, "bonitatis." The term "goodness," as an attribute of God, is equivalent to the Greek word translated "kindness" in the Authorized and Revised Versions falli non potest, mentiri non potest, et quod ait Apostolus, negare Se Ipsum non potest." Ad Catech. ii.

See S. Thos. Summ. Th. i. 25; Schouppe El. Th. Dog., v. 161—165; Martensen's Dogmatics, § 49.

2 Et sapientiae ejus non est numerus. Vulg. The wisdom of God "non tan-tum cognitionem includit, sed etiam cognitioni operationem consentaneam." He is the μόνος σοφός Θεός, and has the characteristic of soleness, aloneness, in His wisdom, See Vaughan in loc.

denotes the Divine Will realizing itself in imparting happiness to the creature, according to the capacities of the creatures, and the counsels of Divine Wisdom<sup>1</sup>. It is that which in regard of human demerits we term "Grace," in regard of human misery, "pity."

- (iv) That He is "the Maker and Preserver of all things visible and invisible." The Article here refers almost in the language of the first clause of the Nicene Creed to the exercise of the operative attributes of God in the creation and preservation of the universe<sup>2</sup>.
  - (a) The Maker, Creator<sup>3</sup>.

    Creation is essentially a work of love and therefore of sacrifice. No less than does the Incarnation, it reveals the χρηστότης of a Personal God, imposing upon Himself limitations. All the gods of the nations, says the Psalmist, are idols, but the Lord made the heavens (Ps. xcvi. 5). Thou, Lord God, exclaims Jeremiah, hast made the heaven and the earth by Thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard for Thee

1 Bonitas in Latin, in Greek χρηστότης. See Rom. ii. 4; xi. 22; Tit. iii. 4. The Latin bonitas =

(i) Natural goodness, i.e. the good quality of a thing, e.g. soli, Caesar, B. G. i. 28; vini, Plin. xiv. 4. 6.

(ii) Moral goodness, i.e. the conformity of the free will with right reason, e.g. "eam potestatem bonitate retinebat," Corn. Nep. Mill. viii.

(iii) Relative goodness, i.e. active benevolence: comp. "bonitas et beneficentia," Cic.

N. D. i. 43. 121; "facit parentes bonitas, non necessitas," Phaedr. iii. 15. 18. Comp. French bonté.

As applied to God bonitas denotes Constans Dei voluntas communicandi felicitatem suis creaturis, secundum conditionem earum, et consilia sapientiæ suæ. Schouppe, Elem. Theol. Dog., i. p. 207.

3 Creator et conservator omnium tum visibilium tum invisibilium = ποιητὴν οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς, ὁρατῶν τε πάντων καὶ ἀοράτων. Symb. Nic.

(Jer. xxxii. 17); and the song of the celestial host as heard by S. John is, Thou art worthy. O Lord our God, to receive the glory and the honour and the power; for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created (Apoc. iv. 11).

(b) The Preserver1, Conservator. But God is not only the Creator of all things, He is the sovereign, and preserves and upholds all things. His relation to the universe did not, as the Deists hold, cease at Creation. He is immanent throughout the universe, sustaining and upholding all things by the Word of His power (Heb. i. 3)2.

PART II.

The Doctrine of the Trinity in Unity.

ix. The Trinity. Having dealt with the essence and the attributes of God, the Article proceeds to deal with the doctrine of the Trinity3, and states that "In Unity

<sup>1</sup> Conservator. The word is not uncommon as a divine epithet among classical writers, e.g. "Pro dei immortales, custodes et conservatores hujus urbis atque imperii." Cic. Sest. xxiv. 53. In inscriptions it occurs as an epithet of Jupiter. The preposition in composition has an intensifying force, and denotes to keep thoroughly, toretain in existence, to uphold and preserve. Hence God is Omnitenens as well as Omnipotens. See Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p. 214; Mason's Faith of the Gospel, pp. 34, 35. Φέρων τε τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αύτοῦ. Vulg. portans, O. L. ferens v. gerens. This present and continuous support and carrying forward to their end of all created things was attributed by Jewish writers to God no less than their creation. The action of God is in this passage referred to the Son: conf. Col. i. 17. He in the words of Œcumenius περιάγει καὶ συνέχει καὶ πηδαλιουχεῖ...τὰ ἀόρατα καὶ τὰ ὅρατα περιφέρων καὶ κυβερνών. See Barrow's Sermons on the Creed. vol. iv. p. 163; Westcott's Historic Faith, p. 37.

3 The word "Trinity" does not occur in Scripture. It is first found in Theophilus of Antioch, A.D. 170. His Greek τριάς first occurs in its Latin equivalent in Tertullian. See Introduction to the Creeds, p. 62, 3.

of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holv Ghost."

- x. The word Person, as used in this connection, needs to be carefully guarded. It is certainly important to exclude the idea of separate individuality, or we shall fall into the error of tritheism. While there are three Persons<sup>2</sup> in the Godhead, no single one of them either exists or acts apart from the other two. There is only One Personal God.
- xi. The Evidence of the Old Testament. Intimations that "the Name of the One God, when written out in full, is a threefold Name," are traceable in the Old Testament:-Thus
  - (i) At the Creation of Man we hear God saying, Let US make man in OUR image, after OUR likeness (Gen. i. 26), and yet in the following verse we read, And God created man in HIS own image (Gen. i. 27).
  - (ii) After the Fall we hear God saying, Behold, the man is become as one of US (Gen. iii. 22); while, when He reveals Himself to Moses at the

A mask, i.e. that through which the sound of the voice passes;

(ii) A character represented by an actor;

(iii) An individual person.
The use of the term by the Latins was regarded with suspicion by the Greeks on account of its equivocal meaning, while the Latins were alike suspicious of the Greek ὁπόστασις, which they could only translate by substantia, as suggesting that the three Persons had not the same Essence. Since, however, the Council of Alexandria, A.D. 362, at which the matter was discussed, Persona and ὑπόστασις have generally been accepted as equivalent. See Introd. to the Creeds,

p. 49, n. 3.
<sup>2</sup> Or Hypostases. "The word ύποστασις was a metaphysical word, for which we have no exact equivalent. Having originally meant the sediment at the bottom of a fluid, it came to mean the substratum or ground of qualities, and so a person, that is, the underlying reality upon which various characters and experiences are based." Strong's Manual of Theology, p. 183.

- burning bush, He bids him tell the people, I AM hath sent Me unto you (Ex. iii. 14);
- The Psalmist says, The Lord said unto my Lord; Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool (Ps. cx. 1);
- In the vision of Isaiah the Seraphim cry one unto another, Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory (Isai. vi. 3).

Here, however mysteriously, we have a foreshadowing of a plurality in the Godhead<sup>1</sup>, intimations that the one Personal God is a Living Monad<sup>2</sup>, at the same time "Tres et Unus"," a Divine Three.

- xii. The Evidence of the New Testament, The obscure intimations, however, of the Old Testament become express revelations in the New. Thus
  - (a) The account of our Lord's Baptism reveals to us the Son baptized, the Father acknowledging Him from heaven, the Holy Ghost descending upon Him in the form of a dove (Matt. iii. 16, 17);
  - Again, while our Lord expressly declares  $(\beta)$ Himself to be one with the Father (John x. 30), He yet says, I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth (John xiv. 16, 17);

2 "More really one even than an individual man is one." Newman's Grammar of Assent, p. 121.
3 "Unus," not merely "unum."

This may be called the keynote of the Athanasian Creed.

<sup>4 &#</sup>x27;Εγώ καὶ ὁ πατηρ εν έσμεν, I and the Father are one. "Every word in this pregnant clause is full of meaning. It is I, not the Son; the Father, not my Father; one essence (& Vulg. unum), not one person ( $\epsilon ls$  Gal. iii. 28, unus); are not am." Bp Westcott in loc.

(γ) But with still greater clearness, when He gives His Apostles their last commission, He commands them to go into all the world, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the Name<sup>1</sup> of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost (Matt. xxviii. 19)<sup>2</sup>.

Thus the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity is taught us not primarily and originally by any Apostolic teacher, or any Apostolic Council, but by our Lord Himself.

xiii. The Unity of the Godhead. The Three Persons of the Trinity have, as we have seen<sup>3</sup>, a common Divine Nature, which is numerically One<sup>4</sup>, as our Lord Himself says, I and the Father are one<sup>5</sup> (John x. 30). This Unity of the Godhead the Article upholds, when it asserts that the Three Persons are "of the same essence, power, and eternity," in other words, that each is God, and in each dwell the whole fulness and all the attributes of the Godhead<sup>6</sup>. For the Catholic doctrine is that,

- (1) The Father is the One Eternal Personal God,
- (2) The Son is the One Eternal Personal God,
- (3) The Spirit is the One Eternal Personal God.

<sup>1</sup> Eis τὸ ὅνομα, not ἐν τῷ ὁνόματι. "By choosing without repetition to say 'the Name,' He teaches that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are One. The revelation of each of the Three is the revelation of the other Two. They cannot be known apart." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, p. 44.

<sup>2</sup> S. Paul's final benediction to the Corinthians is a commemoration of our Lord Jesus Christ, God, and the

Hilar., De Trin., cap. iv.

6 See Cardinal Newman's Grammar of Assent, p. 133. "To each person in one passage or other of the New Testament are ascribed the same titles and works; each is acknowledged as Lord; each is eternal; ...each is Creator; each wills with a supreme will; each is the Author of the new birth; ... what is all this but the Father Eternal, the Son Eternal, and the Holy Ghost Eternal; the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost Omnipotent; the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost God"? Comp. the Athanasian Creed.

Each Person possesses all the Divine attributes, which are inherent in the Divine Essence. Each, in the language of the Athanasian Creed, is Uncreate; each is Infinite; each is Eternal; each is Almighty; each is God; each is Lord.

xiv. The Characteristics of the Three Persons. In speaking, indeed, of the Three Persons we are wont to speak of the Father as the first, the Son as the second, and the Holy Ghost as the third Person in the Trinity. We use this language, not because one Person is "afore or after other," either prior or posterior in time, either superior or inferior in rank, but because there is in the Godhead a certain order of source or origin. Thus it is the property or characteristic to be unbegotten, the Fountain or Source of Godhead<sup>1</sup>;

(i) Of the Father,

(ii) Of the Son,

to be begotten eternally of the Father2:

(iii) Of the Holy Ghost, to proceed eternally3; eternally, because both the generation of the Son and the procession of the Holy Ghost are outside the limitations of time;

but while there is this order of source or origin, whereby One Person may be, not before the other, but from the other, all the three Persons are equally God and equally Lord, for the whole perfection of the Divine Nature is in each.

1 "The Catholic dogma may be said to be summed up in the formula on which St Augustine lays so much stress, "Tree et Unus" not merely "Unum"; hence it is the key-note, as it may be called, of the Athanasian Creed. In that Creed we testify to the Unus Increatus, to the Unus Immensus, Omnipotens, Deus, and Dominus; yet each of the Three also is by Himself Increatus, Immensus, Omnipotens, for Each is that One GOD, though Each is not the Other; Each, as is intimated by Unus Increatus, is the One Personal GOD of Natural Religion." Cardinal Newman's Grammar of Assent, p. 121.

- i. Connection. The subject of the Incarnation naturally follows that of the Blessed Trinity. God, being such as the first Article has stated Him to be, has supplemented His original act of Creation by the manifestation of Himself in human form. The second Article, therefore, proceeds to treat of the nature and purpose of the Selfmanifestation of the Son of God by taking upon Him human flesh.
- ii. Title. In the Edition of 1553 the Title of the Article both in Latin and English varied from the present English form, and ran as follows, "Verbum Dei verum hominem esse factum," "That the Worde or Sonne of God was made very man." The authoritative Latin edition of 1571 has "De Verbo, sive Filio Dei qui verus homo factus est," "Of the Worde or Sonne of God which was made very Man."

iii. Source. The Article, as originally drafted, and as it appeared in the Latin and English editions of 1553, lacked the clauses stating the Eternal generation of the Son and His consubstantiality with the Father. In its earliest form it had constituted, with very slight variation, a portion of the Third Article of the Thirteen of 1538, which was identical with the Third Article of the Augsburg Confession. The additional clauses were introduced in 1563 from the Würtemberg Confession of 15521.

iv. Object. The Article states, in language which symbolizes with the Catholic tradition, the doctrines of the Godhead and of the Incarnation of the Eternal Son. It is thus directed against the ancient Docetic teaching revived in the Sixteenth Century by the Anabaptists, who denied altogether that Christ was "born of the Virgin Mary according to the flesh<sup>2</sup>," holding many other tenets savouring of Arianism, and rejecting the doctrine of the universality of Christ's redemption<sup>3</sup>.

¹ This Confession was a Lutheran Manifesto based very largely upon the Augsburg Confession. It was presented to the Council of Trent by the ambassadors of Würtemberg. The Article de Filio Dei agrees verbatim with the clauses inserted in this Article in 1563; "Credimus et confitemur Filium Dei, Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, ab aterno a Patre suo genitum, verum et æternum Deum, Patri suo consubstantialem." Hardwick, Hist. of the Articles, p. 127.

of the Articles, p. 127.

2 "The chief opponents of Christ's Divinity," we read in one of the Zurich letters dated Aug. 14, 1551, "are the Arians, who are now beginning to shake our Churches with greater violence than ever, as they deny the conception of Christ by the Virgin."

Hardwick, p. 90. Hooper, writing to Bullinger, June 25, 1549, says, "The Anabaptists...deny altogether that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary according to the flesh."

<sup>3</sup> A work published in 1556 tells of one condemned for holding "that. Christ was only incarnate and suffered death for them that died before His Incarnation, and not for them that died since." Hardwick, pp. 89, 90.

- v. Analysis. The Article treats of the following points:—
  - (1) The Deity of the Son of God;
  - (2) His Incarnation;
  - (3) The Union in Him of the two Natures, the Divine and Human;
  - (4) The Fact of the Passion;
  - (5) The Object of the Passion.

(a) The Deity of the Son of God.

vi. The statements of the Article on this point are fourfold. It speaks of the Son (i) as the Word of the Father; (ii) as begotten from everlasting of the Father; (iii) as Very and Eternal God; and (iv) as consubstantial with the Father.

vii. The Word of the Father. In Scripture the application of this term to the Son is explicit in the writings of S. John. In the beginning, we read, was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God (John i. 1)<sup>1</sup>; and the message of the same Apostle in his Epistle is, That which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life<sup>2</sup> (1 John i. 1). The term Word, or Logos, marks the inseparable inherence of the Son in again in Gen. iii. 9, instead of "God called unto Adam," we read "the word (Menra) of the Lord called unto Adam." In the writings of Philo the Logos was an intermediate agency between the Creator and the creature.

"S. John taking the expression the Word, on which human reason had lighted in its gropings, stripped it of its merely philosophical and mythological wrappings, and fixed it as the Divine Word by identifying it with the Person of Christ." See Bp Westcott's Com. on John i. I.

<sup>1</sup> Έν ἀρχῆ ἢν ὁ Λόγος, καὶ ὁ Λόγος ἢν πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, καὶ Θεὸς ἢν ὁ Λόγος. The idea of Logos or Wisdom is dimly traceable in the Old Testament (Gen. i. 3, 6, 9; Ps. xxxiii. 6; Prov. viii., ix.); becomes more clear in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. i. 1-20; xxiv. 1-22; Wisdom vi. 22 sqq.; ix. 17, 18), and clearer still in the Targums and the writings of Philo. In the Targums or Aramaic paraphrases of the Old Testament, we read in Gen. iii. 8, instead of "they heard the Voice of the Lord God," they heard "the Voice of the Word (Memra) of the Lord God";

the Unity of the Godhead. It defines the fact that the Son is the Mediator between the Creator and the creature, the Person by whom the Father is naturally and properly revealed. Hence Scripture tells us that by Him God made the worlds (Heb. i. 2), that in Him all created being subsists (Col. i. 17)<sup>1</sup>, and that through Him God spake to man at the end of these days (Heb. i. 2).

viii. Begotten from everlasting of the Father. But He, the Word, is none other than the Son of God, begotten from everlasting of the Father. There never was when the Father was without His Son. Thus it is of the very being of God to be a Father. To the Word alone, His own proper Son³, the title Son belongs by nature and not by adoption. He is Movoyevýs, only-begotten (John i. 18), and as such, His generation is unique, being "before all worlds," not in time, but in eternity. We cannot fathom that which is unfathomable, a property of the Divine Nature fully known only to the mind of God. All that we can dare to say is that though this relationship is, in its deepest essence, incomprehensible for the finite understanding, as indeed is impressed upon us by our Lord

"proper Father,"  $\pi \alpha \tau \dot{\epsilon} \rho \alpha \ t \delta iov \ \dot{\epsilon} \lambda \epsilon \gamma \epsilon \tau \dot{\nu} \nu \Theta \epsilon \delta \nu$  (John v. 18). "We are apt to say at first hearing that He is God, though He is the Son of God, marvelling at the mystery. But what to man is a mystery, to God is a cause. He is God, not though, but because He is God, not though, but because He is the Son of God." Newman, Parochial Sermons, vi. 57. The Arians made great efforts to avoid acknowledging the proper Sonship of the Word, arguing that He was a  $K\tau l \omega \mu \alpha$ , after His creation made to be Son, instrumental in the creation of all else than Himself. Thus they admitted that He existed before time, but asserted that  $\mathring{\eta} \nu \ \delta \tau \epsilon \ o \mathring{\nu} \kappa \ \mathring{\eta} \nu$ , "there was when He was not."

Himself', yet we must believe that the Infinite could not be the perfectly Blessed One, without an eternal and perfect object of His Love<sup>2</sup>. And this object He has in His Son, who, while He must necessarily be another than the Father, yet has continually the ground of His existence in the being and essence of the Father, and is not a Son of God, but the Son of God, His beloved Son, in Whom He is ever well pleased (Matt. iii. 17)3.

ix. Very and Eternal God. Since the Word is in a proper and yet unique sense, Son of God, He is not another God, a sort of under-God, but "very and Eternal God." Scripture is clear as to the Deity of the Son. S. John distinctly says, the Word was God (John i. 1), and S. Paul tells us that in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily (Col. ii. 9)4, and that He is from all eternity in the essential form of God (Phil. ii. 6). Moreover he speaks of Him as our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit. ii. 13)6, as over all, God blessed for ever (Rom. ix. 5). Indirect

He is perfectus Deus, and not the less such, because whether in virtue of the order of origin, or in virtue of His human nature, He is subordinate to the Father, "æqualis Patri secundum Divinitatem, minor Patre secundum Humanitatem." Έπιγινώσκει, as distinguished from the simple verb, implies a perfect and thorough knowledge. Comp. Luke i. 4, and Bp Lightfoot on Col. i. 9. There is a remarkable affinity between this verse and the general import of the Gospel according to S. John. It suggests a tender and intimate relation of spiritual community, both in reference to power and to knowledge, between the Father and the Son. See Lange in loc., and compare Luke X. 21, 22.

testimony to the same effect is afforded by the ascription to the Son of the same attributes as to the Father, the same power (John v. 21), the same knowledge (John xxi. 17), the same wisdom (Luke xi. 49), the same immortality (Heb. xiii. 8). Moreover He performs the same works as the Father; He forgives sins (Matt. ix. 2 sq.); He quickens and judges men (John v. 24—29). He claims the same honour as is rendered to the Father (John v. 23; xiv. 1), and He allows the homage due to God to be paid to Himself (John xx. 28).

x. Consubstantial with the Father. Moreover, as very and eternal God, He is of one substance with the Father. He is ὁμοούσιος¹, of one and the same essence with the Father. This famous term, of which "consubstantial" is the English equivalent, is not found in Scripture, but acquired an important dogmatic meaning owing to the exigencies of the Arian controversy. God as the I AM, has an essence. The Son, if He be God, and no mere creature, is of the essence of the Father, and the term δμοού- $\sigma_{los}$  is a perfectly natural statement of the relation between the Father and the Son. The Arians were willing to exalt Him to any conceivable height short of Godhead2, but in so doing they parted Him from the Divine essence by a fathomless chasm, and really placed between God and the creature a subordinate Æon. The Nicene Fathers, therefore, proclaimed in unmistakeable terms the real and proper Godhead of the Son, and laid it down that He was not of a different nature from the Father, as are all things Supposing the writer to designate one Person as  $\mu\epsilon\gamma\lambda\lambda\omega$   $\Theta\epsilon\omega$  and another Person as  $\Sigma\omega\tau\eta\rho\sigma$   $\eta\mu\omega\nu$ , the article would have been repeated before  $\Sigma\omega\tau\eta\rho\sigma$ . declaration of Christ's Divinity." See Ellicott in loc.

visible and invisible, whereof He is the Maker; nor of a merely similar essence, ὁμοιούσιος, possessing the closest resemblance short of identity of essence; but that He is, without any qualification whatsoever, of one essence, ὁμοούσιος, with the Father, God Himself in all His perfection and completeness, blessed for evermore (Rom. ix. 5)¹.

(b) The Incarnation of the Son of God.

xi. The Incarnation. Having stated that the Word is consubstantial with the Father, the Article proceeds to treat of His consubstantiality with man, or His Incarnation. Respecting this unspeakable mystery it affirms that the ever blessed Son of God "took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance." The Article thus agrees with the statements of the Creeds. For whereas the Apostles' Creed affirms that He. Who was with the Father before all worlds, "was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary"; and the Nicene Creed expands this by stating that He was "incarnate by the Holy Ghost ... and was made man"; and the Athanasian Creed declares that "our Lord Jesus Christ,...God, of the substance of the Father, begotten before the worlds," became "Man, of the substance of His mother, born in the world," the Article gathers together these statements into one whole, and places before us in terms at once accurate and distinct the mighty mystery of the Incarnation.

the Father doeth (John v. 19), and is in heaven with the Father while He holds converse with men on earth (John iii. 13). Without any limitation, therefore, He is able to speak of all that is the Father's as at the same time His (John xvii. 10), and thus Himself justifies us in speaking of a true oneness of nature (ὁμοουσία) between Him and the Father." Oosterzee, Christian Dogmatics, pp. 277, 278.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Between the Son and the Father there exists unceasingly the most intimate community of life and love. This lies in the nature of the case, and is besides constantly asserted by the Son Himself. The Father loveth the Son, and sheweth Him all things that Himself doeth (John v. 20). The Father honoureth the Son (John viii. 54), and hath delivered all things unto Him (Matt. xi. 27). The Son, on the other hand, doeth all things whatsoever

xii. Foreshadowings of the Incarnation. stupendous event had long been foretold and foreshadowed1. The Eternal Word in frequent Theophanies had presented Himself to the vision of Patriarchs and Prophets. He had imaged Himself beforehand in elect sons of men under the Old Covenant<sup>2</sup>, and in them had realised, long before He appeared, some features of the Being, Whose entire Divine and human fulness He purposed to express in the revelation of Himself, as at once the Son of God and the Son of Man. But since the taint and corruption of our nature descends to all men, who are born in the ordinary course of the offspring of Adam, it was not possible that He could be conceived like other men. Accordingly the Spirit3, who in the beginning brooded over the waters. and awoke order out of chaos and life out of death (Gen. i. 2), brought it about by the exercise of Divine Power that in the fulness of time (Gal. iv. 4) the Virgin Mary should, without the intervention of any human father whatever, become in time the mother of Him Who was with the Father from all eternity. In meek submission to the Divine will she humbly accepted the supernatural dignity in store for her, and gave herself up to be the instrument of the Divine counsel, saying to the angel Gabriel, Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word (Luke i. 38).

xiii. The Fulfilment. Thus it came to pass that He, Who is very God, condescended to be "conceived by the Holy Ghost," and so far from "abhorring the Virgin's womb," deigned to take unto Him "of her substance" the simplest original element of man's nature, before it came to have any personal human subsistence. Moreover, passing through all the stages necessary to maturity, He was born into this our world of the Virgin Mary, even as other children are born, at Bethlehem of Judah in the reign of the Roman Emperor Augustus (Luke ii. 6, 7). Thus "in great humility" He willed to be conceived and take upon Him our nature, and so the new Adam was formed, not as the first Adam out of the dust of the ground, lest He should miss the participation with us in a common nature, but from a woman, of the substance of the Virgin Mary His mother, that as her seed He might "bruise the serpent's head."

(c) The Union of the two Natures.

xiv. The Effect of this infinite condescension on His part, of this conjunction of the Divine with the human, is stated in the Article to have been this, that

- (α) "Two whole and perfect Natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one Person, never to be divided<sup>3</sup>";
- (β) "Whereof is one Christ, very God, and very Man."

For in taking upon Him man's nature the second Person in the Trinity lost nothing of His essentially Divine attributes, and while the Manhood He assumed did not lessen the fulness of Godhead, the Godhead did not take from the verity of Manhood. "He was, in the flesh, as before the Incarnation, in the bosom of the Father1." Hence by this union a Divine Person appeared in this our world, in Whom the Divine just as little existed without the human, as the human without the Divine, "One Christ," true God and true Man. Both natures, differing, as the uncreated from the created, became in consequence of this personal union henceforth inseparably joined together?, and that not by any blending or confusion of the Divine and human essences, or any conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by His "taking the Manhood into God"; and as the rational soul and flesh constitute one man<sup>3</sup>, so God and man is one Christ. And the two natures thus united are not only real but complete. Our Lord, as born of the Virgin Mary, was not an emanation from God, or a Being all but God, He was God Himself, in all His Perfection and Completeness. But He was also perfect Man. No one element or faculty of human nature was wanting to the Manhood which He assumed, and to which, by the hypostatic union, a true personality was supplied by the Personality of the Son of God Who assumed it4. But we cannot be surprised at its baffling our comprehension. "The highest miracle in the world's history will assuredly be the last of all to be understood!"

(d) The Fact of the Passion.

xv. Who truly suffered. Having declared that the Eternal Son of God thus became Man, the Article proceeds to enunciate the truth that He still further humbled Himself even unto death, that He truly suffered, was crucified, died, and was buried. Here again the statement made sums up the teaching of the Creeds. For while the Athanasian Formula simply asserts that He "suffered," and the Nicene affirms that He "was crucified under Pontius Pilate,...suffered, and was buried," and the Apostles' Creed adds that "He died," the Article brings out strongly the fact that His Passion and death were real and actual2 and not in appearance only. It was not unimportant to insist on this, for many of the Anabaptist School in the sixteenth century had revived the erroneous teaching of the Docetæ, and represented the Death of our Redeemer as having been apparent only and not real. In respect to this question, which is vital to the Christian Faith, it is to be ality. Hence the Lord never says 'I and the Logos,' or 'I and the Son,' but 'I and the Father are one thing'; for this 'I' is the Son Himself, who is inseparably one with Jesus of Nazareth." # (e) The Object of the Passion.

xvi. Its twofold Nature. Having asserted that the Passion of our Lord was a real objective fact, the Article proceeds to deal with its object and purpose. The Nicene and Athanasian symbols affirm that "He suffered for us and for our salvation." The Article amplifies this statement and affirms that our Lord humbled Himself to the death of the Cross

- "That He might reconcile His Father to us";
- "That He might be a sacrifice, not only for (2) original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men "

It thus emphasizes two of the three figures, under which Scripture represents to us the purpose of the Passion, (1) Reconciliation or At-one-ment; (2) Propitiation or Sacrifice.

xvii. Reconciliation. The idea which lies at the root of the Greek word  $\kappa \alpha \tau \alpha \lambda \lambda \alpha \gamma \dot{\eta}^2$ , which we have rendered by Reconciliation or At-one-ment, is that of bringing together those who have been at variance. Now in consequence of the Fall man is not only in a state of bondage, but also in one of alienation from God, and S. Paul speaks of the wrath of God being revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold down the truth in unrighteousness (Rom. i. 18)1. In this aspect the purpose of our Lord's Passion was in our nature and for us to do what we could not do ourselves, namely, make peace between man and God. When, therefore, He offered Himself on the Altar of the Cross, He died for all, and all died in Him2, and so He abolished in His flesh the enmity which sin had interposed between the creature and the Creator. Hence S. Paul affirms that in Christ God reconciled man<sup>3</sup>, the world<sup>4</sup>, and all things<sup>5</sup> to Himself. Here, as in other places, Holy Scripture speaks of the sinner as reconciled to God, that is, of the Divine work of originating. The Article suggests the human work of corresponding. For while the essential nature of God is unchangeable Love, it is also and equally unchangeable Righteousness, and the fact of sin in man disturbs the operation of God's attributes. If, then, reunion was to be brought about and an at-one-ment rendered possible, God must find His "delights among the sons of men." This He could do, when the Son of God, having in our nature lived a life of perfect obedience, offered up that unblemished all died (in Him). See a striking sermon of F. W. Robertson on this verse.

xviii. A Sacrifice. Besides bringing about this Reconciliation, the Article further affirms that the object of our Lord's Passion was that He might be a Victim and a Sacrifice "not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men2." On this subject the language of Holy Scripture is explicit: for

- (a) It was expressly said to Joseph by the Angel, Thou shalt call His Name Fesus, for He3 shall save His people from their sins (Matt. i. 21);
- Again John the Baptist expressly pointed Him (b)out as the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world (John i. 29);
- And the Apostle John writes, If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins (I John ii. I, 2).

As the appointed Victim, destined in the eternal purpose4 to be the sacrifice for sin, He became by His death the propitiation not only for original sin5, but also for all

When our Lord suffered on the Cross, our nature suffered in Him, for all Humanity was represented by Him and gathered up in Him. In Him our nature satisfied its old and heavy debt, for the presence of His Divinity gave it transcendent merit. "Dignitas carnis Christi non est æstimanda solum secundum carnis naturam, sed secundum personam assumentem, in quantum scilicet erat caro Dei ex quo habebat dignitatem infinitam." S. Thom. Aq. Sum. iii. 48. 2. "That which setteth the high price on this sacrifice, is this; that He which offereth it unto God, is God." Bp Andrewes, Serm. ii. 152. "The omission of the important word 'all' in many modern copies of the Article is without the least authority. 4 Comp. Apoc. xiii. 8, τοῦ ἀρνίου τοῦ ἐσφαγμένου ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου. 5 The guilt of original sin is cancelactual sins of men¹. Thus:-

- (a) For S. Peter the redeeming work of Christ reaches out beyond the limits of the Land of Promise and includes the very proselyte of the gate, wherever he may be found (Acts ii. 38, 39)<sup>2</sup>;
- (β) As we should expect, the Imperialism of S. Paul takes a wider sweep. The worst corruptions of the cities of the Empire yield to the power of the Holy Name (I Cor. vi. II). What the Apostle of the Gentiles has once seen in full and living effect at Corinth or at Ephesus is an earnest of what may be brought about anywhere and everywhere³;
- (γ) With S. John the thought goes deeper still. The Righteous One lays His hand upon the whole universe of ordered being; it is not only that every act of sin may be forgiven, that the power of the sin-principle may be broken, that the strong force of love may rule the souls of men, but that nothing stands outside His influence. He is the propitiation for the whole world (1 John ii. 1, 2).

ARTICLE III.

De descensu Christi ad Inferos.

Qvemmadmodum Christus pro nobis mortuus est et sepultus, ita est etiam credendus ad Inferos descendisse. 1571.

Of the goyng downe of Christe into hell.

As Christe dyed for vs, and was buryed: so also it is to be believed that he went downe into hell.

- i. Connection. The third Article carries on the subject treated of in the second, and assures us that as Christ died and was buried, so also it is to be believed that He went down into the place of departed spirits. This, however, is an event in the economy of redemption, which so far differs from the above mentioned events, as it lies out of the range of human experience, and is, therefore, rather a deduction from them than an historical event coordinate with them.
- ii. Language and History. As it stands at present, the Article consists only of a single sentence stating simply the fact of our Lord's descent into Hades. Herein it differs very considerably from the draft of 1553. Then the Article consisted of two clauses of the which the latter ran as follows:—"For the bodie laye in the sepulchre, untill the resurrection; but his Ghoste departing from hym, was with the ghostes that were in prison or in Helle, and didde preach to the same as the place of S. Peter dothe

iii. Object. The object of the Article was to vindicate the Catholic doctrine of our Lord's descent into the realm of spirits, and to calm the controversies on the subject<sup>2</sup>, which at the time agitated the country. But their continued violence, in spite of the effort thus made, led to the omission of the clause containing the allusion to the well-known language of S. Peter on the subject (1 Pet. iii. 19), when the Elizabethan revision was carried out in 1563. There does not seem to have been the least desire to deny that the passage in S. Peter applied to the descent of our Lord into the place of departed spirits, but simply a wish to avoid any theorising on this mysterious subject, which might only rouse still further disputation.

iv. The descent into Hell is not an Article which is found in the oldest Creeds of the Church. The Nicene Creed after dealing with the fact of our Lord's death proceeds to speak of His Resurrection. The Apostles' Creed and the Quicunque Vult, as also our present Article, following their example, declare what happened to His human spirit after death. The actual expression "Descendit ad inferna" or "ad inferos" occurs first in the Arian Creed of nus." Hardwick, p. 292, n.

<sup>2</sup> Particularly in the Diocese of Exeter. See the quotation from the Papers of Alley, Bishop of Exeter, in 1563. "There have been," he writes, "in my Diocese great invectives between the preachers, one against the other, and also partakers with them; some holding that the going down of Christ His Son to hell was nothing else but the virtue and strength of Christ His death, to be made manifest and known to them that were dead before. Others say that descendit ad inferna is nothing else but that Christ did sustain upon the Cross the infernal pains of hell when He called, Pater, quare me dereliquisti? i.e., "Father, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Finally others preach that this Article is not contained in other symbols, neither in the symbol of Cyprian, or rather Rufine. And all these sayings they ground upon Erasmus and the Germans, and especially upon the authority of Mr Calvin and Mr Bullinger." Strype's Annals, i. Pti. p. 348.

the Council of Ariminum about the middle of the fourth century<sup>1</sup>, and in the Creed of the Church of Aquileia about A.D. 4002. It had then no place in the Roman Creed, but it is found in the Creed commented on by Venantius Fortunatus towards the end of the sixth century, and thenceforth is of frequent occurrence<sup>3</sup>.

v. The word Hell, as used in the Article and in our English Version of the Creeds, is not to be confounded with "the place of torment," or "the bottomless pit5." It is the same as the Hebrew Sheol and the Greek Hades<sup>6</sup>, which denote "the covered place," "the invisible underworld." This was represented by the Jews under a threefold phrase:—(i) "The Garden of Eden" or "Paradise"; (ii) "Under the throne of glory "; (iii) "In Abraham's bosom "."

When the Apollinarians denied our Lord's possession of a rational human soul, S. Athanasius asked them how they explained the Descent into Hell. Did plained the Descent into Hell. He indeed divide His outer man into two parts, and thus manifest Himself at once in the tomb and in Hades? And the question was fatal to the position which they assumed. from the A. S. hélan=to hide, cover, or conceal. Compare Myrc's Instructions for Parish Priests, 1053, 1506. "Hast thou i-founde any bynge

From the Greek word παράδεισος, originally a Persian word, denoting the park of a king rich in fruits and flowers. The word occurs in (i) Luke xxiii. 43; (ii) 2 Cor. xii. 4; (iii) Apoc. ii. 7. See Edersheim's Life of Jesus of Nazareth, ii. p. 599; Trench's Epp. to the Seven Churches, pp. 93, 94.

- vi. The Fact of our Lord's descent into Hades is proved most clearly from Scripture:—
  - (α) By His own words to the repentant malefactor on the Cross, This day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise (Luke xxiii. 43);
  - (β) By the words of S. Peter on the day of Pentecost, when, applying the prophetic language of the sixteenth Psalm, he distinctly states respecting our Lord that His soul was not left in Hades, neither did His flesh see corruption (Acts ii. 31)¹.
  - (γ) By the words of S. Paul, when he says of Christ that He, Who ascended, is the same that descended into the lower parts of the earth (Eph. iv. 9)²;
  - (δ) By the words of S. Peter in his first Epistle, when he affirms that Christ was put to death in His flesh, but was quickened in His spirit<sup>8</sup>, and that in His spirit He went<sup>4</sup> and preached<sup>5</sup> to the spirits in prison<sup>6</sup>, who aforetime were disobedient, when the longsuffering of God waited<sup>4</sup>

Where it is clear that if His soul was not left in Hades, He must Himself have been there.

3 Comp. Vulg. Mortificatus quidem

carne, vivificatus autem spiritu.

4 Πορευθείς. The word must refer to an actual transference, just as in 1 Pet. iii. 22 we have πορευθείς εἰς οὐραγόν.

<sup>5</sup> Ἐκήρυξεν = He proclaimed as a herald. The word is nearly equivalent to εὐηγγελίσατο, as in other places of the New Testament. "The word had been familiar to the Apostle's ear during his Lord's ministry on earth. It had become familiar to the Church through the oral or written narratives of the Gospel history." Dean Plumptre in loc.

6 Φυλακή from φυλάσσειν denotes (i) A watch of the night (Matt. xiv. 25; Luke xii. 38); (ii) a place of safe keeping, a prison (Mark vi. 17, 27; John iii. 24; Acts v. 19; xii. 4; xvi. 27, &c.). Here it denotes the place of waiting appointed by God as the habitation of disembodied souls, between death and the resurrection. See Bishop Horsley's Sermon on the text.

 Gal. v. 5. Observe the imperfect in the days of Noah<sup>1</sup>, while the ark was preparing (1 Pet. iii. 18—20).

vii. As to the practical Lessons which our Lord's descent teaches, we learn:—

- (a) That as perfect Man He condescended to endure to the full all the limitations which pertain to man;
- (b) That He hallowed every condition of human existence;
- (c) That death has no mystery which He has not fathomed;
- (d) That there is nothing in the fact of death, nothing in the consequences of death, which He has not endured for us.

viii. The completeness of His mediatorial work required that He should fully experience and thereby fully overcome the power of death<sup>2</sup>. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of our beholding Jesus made a little lower than the angels...that by the grace of God He should taste death<sup>3</sup> for every man (Heb. ii. 9). By the term "taste" the writer means that our Lord really experienced all that death means on our behalf, as only a perfectly Holy Being tense=was waiting during the whole period of their disobedience, i.e. 120 years (Gen. vi. 3). The  $\delta\pi\delta$  denotes the full time during which the waiting was exercised. "Exspectabat donec exspectandi finis erat." Bengel.

The prominence given to the history of Noah in our Lord's eschato-

The prominence given to the history of Noah in our Lord's eschatological teaching comes out in S. Matt. xxiv. 37, 38; Luke xvii. 26, 27. That His words made a great impression on S. Peter's mind and recollection may be inferred both from the present passage and from 2 Pet. ii. 5; iii. 6.

1 "Eo probabilius est nonnullos ex tanta multitudine, veniente pluvia, resipuisse; cumque non credidissent, dum exspectaret Deus, dum arca strucretur, postea, cum arca structa esset, et pœna ingrueret, credere cœpisse; quibus postea Christus, eorumque similibus, se præconem gratiæ præstiterit." Bengel in loc.

<sup>3</sup> For the expression γεύσηται θανάτου comp. Matt. xvi. 28; John viii. 52, and Westcoit's note in loc. was able to do¹. Such an experience would naturally involve the descent into Hades, for only thus could He become acquainted with death and all that follows death. Moreover the descent into Hades was essential to His conquest of death². In the vision of Himself in His glorified humanity to S. John He reassures the terrified Apostle with the words, I am the First and the Last and the Living One; and I became dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore and I have the keys of death and of Hades (Apoc. i. 17, 18)³. We can have little doubt but that He refers to the fact that He had Himself been in Hades. His possession of the keys of Hades implies His conquest of death, in that He had led captivity captive⁴ (Eph. iv. 8).

ix. The Issues of the Descent. What was the exact purport and issue of His activity in the abode of departed spirits we are not told, but only that, very Man

1 "Man, as he is, cannot feel the full significance of death, the consequence of sin, though he is subject to the fear of it; but Christ, in His sin-lessness, perfectly realised its awfulness. In this fact lies the immeasurable difference between the death of Christ, simply as death, and that of the holiest martyr." Westcott on Heb. ii. 9.

2 "By His descent into Hades, Christ revealed Himself as the Redeemer of all souls. The descent into the realm of the dead gave expression to the truth, that the distinctions Here and There—the limits of place—are of no significance regarding Christ, and do not concern His kingdom." Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p.

3 Έγω είμι ὁ πρώτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος, καὶ ὁ ζών · καὶ ἐγενόμην νεκρός, καὶ ἰδού ζών είμι εἰς τοὺς αἰώνας τών αἰώνων, καὶ ἔχω τὰς κλεῖς τοῦ θανάτου καὶ τοῦ ἄδου. Apoc. i. 18. "Our Lord used the key of Hades on the Cross when He admitted the soul of the Penitent into Paradise (Luke xxiii. 43), and He will use it at the Great Day, when He will unlock the gates of Hades, and will call forth the spirits of all men, and reunite every soul to its own body, which He will raise from the grave (Joh. v. 28)." Captivity in the abstract is put for the concrete; whether the concrete be active, "him who makes captive," or passive, "those who are made captive," is immaterial to the final result, for if Christ led captive the conqueror, He thereby freed the conquered; if He led captive "the conquered," He must first have "led captive the conqueror."

in disembodied spirit1, He went and preached to the spirits in prison (1 Pet. iii. 19), and we gather from a passage in the succeeding chapter of S. Peter's Epistle that He preached to them "a Gospel" (I Pet. iv. 6), and so the power of His Passion was felt in the unseen world, even before His Resurrection<sup>2</sup>. The Catholic doctors of the early Church fully acknowledged that the Advent of the Lord in the spiritual world must have been a source of blessedness to the holy souls in Abraham's bosom. Hades without Him, and Hades with Him as the possessor of its keys, must have been two different places. But the question whether His visit made any difference in their subsequent condition was more open to dispute. Some held that it made none. Others held that He delivered some souls from Hades<sup>3</sup>, and carried them to a better place, even to His kingdom of glory. On this point, however, Scripture preserves an impressive and significant silence. We may surely acquiesce in the opinion of S. Augustine that we "cannot believe Christ went down to Hades in vain4," and leave the results under the shadow of His throne, Who by His descent into the unseen world

<sup>1</sup> According to the New Testament use of the word πνεῦμα, the reference here to Christ's human spirit does not exclude that to the Holy Spirit. His human spirit was indwest and influenced by the Holy Spirit.

ARTICLE IV.

Resurrectio Christi.

Christus vere a mortuis resurrexit, suumque corpus cum carne, ossibus, omnibusque ad integritatem humanæ naturæ pertinentibus, recepit, cum quibus in cœlum ascendit, ibique residet, quoad extremo die ad iudicandos [ _ ] homines reuersurus sit.

Of the Resurrection of Christe.

Christe dyd truely aryse agayne from death, and toke agayne his body, with flesh, bones, and all thinges apparteyning to the perfection of mans nature, wherewith he ascended into heauen, and there sitteth, vntyll he returne to iudge all men at the last day.

- i. Connection. The fourth Article follows the third in the order suggested by the historical facts of which it treats, for, as the third Article of the Forty-two expressed it, "the bodie laye in the sepulchre, untill the resurrection; but his Ghoste departing from hym, was with the ghostes that were in prison or in Helle."
- ii. The Title, as found both in Latin and in English in the Forty-two Articles of 1553, corresponds with the Latin title of 1563. The Latin Edition of 1571, printed by John Day, and published by Royal authority, has "De Resurrectione Christi," and so corresponds with the authoritative English Edition of the same year.
- iii. The Source, from which the Article is derived, cannot be indicated with quite the same certainty as in the case of the previous Articles. When, however, we consider that the Treatise called Reformatio Rerum Ecclesiasticarum was being compiled during much the same period as the Articles, and that the compilers of the two formularies were in a large degree the same persons, it is possible that here and elsewhere the Articles may have been influenced by the wording of the Reformatio. The latter formulary does not any more than the Article itself appear to borrow from any known Confession, and it is not improbable that we have in it the language of the compilers themselves.

iv. Object. The Article is complementary to the second and third, and affirms the proper Manhood¹ of our Lord after His Resurrection in opposition to the fanatical, half-docetic school of the Anabaptists. Of these some impugned the record of the Resurrection as a literal fact, and contended that the flesh of Christ had never been the flesh of a created being, and is now so deified as to retain no semblance of humanity². The intention, therefore, of the Article is to assert that having taken the manhood into God, our Lord did not lay it aside when He conquered death, but in that manhood arose from the grave, the Incarnation being no merely temporary indwelling of the Godhead in flesh, but the permanent and indissoluble, because hypostatic, union of the two natures, Divine and human.

This was specially the teaching of Caspar Schwenckfeld, a Silesian nobleman, born in 1490. He maintained that (1) our Lord's flesh is now so deified as to be properly Divine; (2) His proper Humanity was not created of the substance of the Blessed Virgin, but came down from heaven, See Hardwick's Hist. Ref., pp. 266, 267. Compelled to leave Silesia in 1528 Schwenckfeld consorted with various sections of the Anabaptists, and Ranke thinks it highly probable that his influence contributed largely to the development of the more mystical forms of Anabaptism. Ranke, Reform. iii. 563.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Credatur item Dominus noster Jesus Christus, etiam post resurrectionem, duplici natura constare; divina quidem, immensa, incircumscripta, et infinita, quæ ubique sit et omnia impleat; humana vero, finita et descripta humani corporis terminis ac finibus, qua, postquam peccata nostra perpurgavisset, in cœlos ascendit, ibique ita sedet ad dexteram Patris, ut non ubique sit, quippe quem oportet in cœlo remanere, usque ad tempus restitutionis omnium, cum ad judicandos vivos et mortuos veniet, ut reddat cuique juxta opera sua." Ref. Leg. de Summa Trin. c. 4.

- v. Analysis. The Article may be thus divided:-
  - It asserts the reality of Christ's Resurrection (i) from death:
  - It affirms that He "took again His Body with (ii) flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature";
  - (iii) It identifies the Resurrection Body with that in which He ascended up on high;
  - (iv) It states the fact of the heavenly Session:
  - (v) It affirms the fact and purpose of the Second Advent.

(a) The Fact of the Resurrection.

vi. The First Propagators of the Faith placed the fact of the Resurrection in the very forefront of their preaching1. They distinctly asserted that Jesus of Nazareth, Who had been seen and known by many to whom they spoke, Whose crucifixion had been public and notorious. had actually risen from the dead in accordance with His own pledge beforehand that this event would take place. The filling up of the Apostolic College<sup>3</sup>, the first sermon of S. Peter on the day of Pentecost<sup>4</sup>, the declaration of the Apostles Peter and John before the Sanhedrim<sup>5</sup>, the first address of S. Paul at Antioch<sup>6</sup>, his subsequent addresses at Thessalonica7 and especially at Athens8, the declarations contained in all his Epistles, and notably the first to the Corinthians9, all proceed upon the assumption of the <sup>1 &</sup>quot;The historical truth of the Resurrection is a most serious matter, and must be capable of standing the severest historical criticism, for if Christ did not rise again from death to life—'cadit quæstio'—all Christian dogma, all Christian faith, is at an end." Lux Mundi, p. 236.

Resurrection as a literal, historical fact, all regard it as the very kernel of the Christian teaching.

- vii. The Early Fathers naturally follow their example, and put forward the Resurrection as the keystone of the Christian Faith. Thus
  - (a) Ignatius writes "I know and believe that even after His Resurrection He was in the flesh1";
  - (b) Irenæus in his Creed of the Church of Lyons and Vienne puts forward the Resurrection of our Lord as one of its most definite Articles<sup>2</sup>;
  - (c) Justin Martyr says, "At His Crucifixion even they that were acquainted with Him all denied and forsook Him; but afterwards, when He rose from the dead, He taught them to read the prophecies, in which all these things were foretold to happen<sup>3</sup>";
  - (d) Tertullian writes, "Believing the Resurrection of Christ, we believe also in our own for whom He died and rose again<sup>4</sup>";
  - (e) S. Chrysostom writes, "If Christ did not rise again, the whole reason of the Dispensation is overthrown."
- viii. Attestations of the Event. The fact of the Resurrection is attested by the witness of enemies and friends:—
  - (a) Of enemies:—

This testimony is of the most varied kind, and comes to us from

- (I) Individuals, such as S. Mary of Magdala (John xx. 11—18); S. Peter (Luke xxiv. 34; I Cor. xv. 5); S. James the Lord's brother (1 Cor. xv. 7); S. Thomas (John xx. 24—29);
- (2) Groups of Persons, such as the ministering women (Matt. xxviii. 9); the two disciples journeying to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 13—35); the Ten (Luke xxiv. 36—43); the Seven by the lake-side (John xxi. 1—14); the five hundred brethren on the appointed mountain (Matt. xxviii. 16—18; 1 Cor. xv. 6); the whole Apostolic body just before the Ascension (Luke xxiv. 50).

They saw Him not once, but many times, not separately but together, not by night only but by day. They not only saw Him, but conversed with Him, ate in His presence, touched with their hands His Sacred Body. They could not all have been deceived. They could not all have been false.

- ix. Three well-known Non-Christian explanations of the event here require to be noticed:—
  - (i) Some deny the reality of our Lord's death.

    They contend<sup>1</sup>
    - (a) That the rapidity, with which He is recorded to have died, was quite unusual in cases of crucifixion, and that the supposed death was a swoon;
    - (b) That consciousness was restored by the coolness of the rock-hewn tomb, and the pungency of the spices, and that as a fact such cases have been known to occur.

But to this it may be replied that,

- (a) So far from the recovery, which is thus supposed, being probable, the fact is that it was extremely difficult, with the best medical aid, to save the life of a crucified person<sup>2</sup>, and this would have been impossible in the case of our Lord after all the severities He had endured;
- (b) The resuscitation of a person only just not dead could not have conveyed the immediate impression of a triumph over death<sup>3</sup>;

at his intercession taken down from the Cross, but of the three, only one, in spite of every care, survived. See Godet's Lectures in Defence of the Christian Faith, i. p. 24.

Christian Faith, i. p. 24.

3 "A man half-dead, dragging himself in languor out of his tomb, with

- (c) The explanation is inconsistent with our Lord's character in respect to His veracity. The fraud practised would have been as certain of detection as morally damaging;
- (d) Scripture reveals an unmistakeable difference in our Lord's Body before and after His Resurrection.
- (ii) Others maintain that the Body was stolen away by the disciples.
  - (1) This was the explanation circulated at the time by the Sadducees, and still current when S. Matthew's Gospel was written. It was also subsequently maintained by Celsus the Jew in his controversy with Origen<sup>1</sup>;
  - (2) But it gains little serious acceptance in the present day, and it is sufficient to say that the exalted morality taught and practised by the disciples is incompatible with the existence of an act of deliberate deception as the very basis of their life and work<sup>2</sup>.

wounds requiring careful and continuous medical treatment,—could he in such a state have produced upon the minds of his disciples the impression that he was the victor over death and the grave, the Prince of Life?—an impression which nevertheless was the source and spring of all their subsequent activity." Strauss, Life of Yesus, p. 298, Ed. 1864. See Christlieb, p. 457. Moreover the active exertion of the journey to Emmaus would have been impossible for a man "half-dead, dragging himself in languor" from a tomb in which he had been placed as dead but three days before. See the Bp of Derry's

"Ανδρας χειροτονήσαντες έκλεκτους εls πάσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην ἐπέμψατε, κηρύσσοντας ὅτι..."οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ κλέψαντες αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ μνήματος νυκτός...πλανῶσι τοὺς ἀνθρώπους λέγοντες ἐγηγέρθαι αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν." Just. Mart. Dial. cum Tryph., § 108; Origen contra Cels., ii. 56; see Milligan's Resurrection of our Lord. p. 70.

gan's Resurrection of our Lord, p. 79.

2 Others with Bauer abandon the position of valid criticism, and contend that what really happened at that which we call the Resurrection, remains outside the sphere of historical "investigation." See Godet's Defence,

i. 36, 37.

(iii) Others hold the appearances of our Lord to have been subjective and unreal.

This is what is commonly called "the Theory of Visions," which once received as much support as does the Allegorical Theory at the present day. It supposes the disciples to have been either the victims of an hallucination or in a state of ecstasy. The theory is sought to be supported by the following considerations:

- (α) The excitement of the Apostles and especially of the Holy Women and Mary of Magdala on their visit to the tomb;
- $(\beta)$  The difficulty of believing that Jesus was really gone;
- ( $\gamma$ ) The familiarity of the Jews with the idea of a resurrection from the dead;
- (δ) The traditions connected with some of the Old Testament Saints;
- ( $\epsilon$ ) The language of prophecy respecting the Messiah, and the actual predictions of Jesus.

x. Refutation of the Theory of Visions. Now it is important to notice at the outset that even were it possible to reconcile this theory with the actual circumstances, it would fail to satisfy the requirements of an historical religion, for no degree of intensity in the subjective experience of the disciples can constitute the objective reality of the appearances themselves. Their objectivity is essential to their significance. "A conviction that a particular person had risen again when he had not is simply false, however it may have been produced?" But to take the considerations separately, what is their worth, when tested by the facts?

- (a) The supposed excitement is inconsistent with
  - The calm deliberate use of the critical faculty on the part of the disciples to which the Scriptures testify<sup>1</sup>:
  - The settled depression of S. Peter and S. John<sup>2</sup> in the early morning and of Cleopas and his companion<sup>8</sup> on the afternoon of the first Easter Day:
  - The practical collected forethought displayed (3) by the disciples during the great forty days, and the ten days that followed4:
- The Holy Women expected to find a dead body (b) in a closed sepulchre (Mark xvi. 3); and the solution of the empty sepulchre put forward by Mary of Magdala was that the dead body had been removed:
- The language of Martha (John xi. 24) proves that the idea of a resurrection previous to the last day was quite unfamiliar to the Jewish mind;
- The return to earth of a translated saint like (d) Enoch, Moses, and Elijah is quite different from a resurrection. Such a person is not supposed to die, and death therefore is not conquered but avoided. Such a return is not a rising from the grave at all, but a mission from heaven<sup>5</sup>:

<sup>1</sup> See Matt. xxviii. 7, 10; Mark xvi. 9—14; Luke xxiv. 37 sqq.; John xx. 25. The language of Matt. xxviii. 17, οἱ δὲ ἐδίστασαν, compared with that of Acts i. 14; iv. 33 implies the use and satisfaction of the critical faculty.

- (e) Nothing in Scripture indicates that the disciples either appreciated any prophetic reference to the Resurrection of the Messiah, or understood our Lord's predictions of it<sup>1</sup>. On the contrary, when the event had actually occurred, the report of it seemed foolish babble<sup>2</sup>, and the appearance of the Risen Lord, so far from being welcomed as the expected, was shunned as a phantasm, and nothing less than contact assured the Apostles of the reality.
- xi. Further considerations. But there are certain other considerations which are irreconcileable with the Theory of Visions.
  - (a) The state of mind liable to the supposed vision has been explained as hallucination or ecstasy. Now the former is "a symptom of some grave physical or moral derangement<sup>3</sup>," and the latter has been defined as being "an affection of the brain in which the exaltation of certain ideas so absorbs the attention that sensation is suspended, voluntary movement arrested, and even the vital actions often retarded<sup>4</sup>." Were Cleopas and his companion walking involuntarily to Emmaus when Jesus joined them by the way? Was it of the result of suspended sensation that S. John could write, That which of the old prophets should be sent from heaven, whither they had been specially withdrawn, to prepare the advent of the Messiah; but this expectation .....centered in a direct mission from God, and not in a rising from the grave to a new life." Westcott's Gospel of the Resurrection, p.

understands the word in the sense of delirium; this is, however, a derived and rare sense, found only in medical writers. The original sense is non-sense, empty babble.

- we have heard, that which we have seen with our eves, that which we beheld, that which our hands handled, concerning the Word of Life...declare we unto you (I John i. I, 3)?
- Again, comparing the disciples before and after (b) the appearances, we observe that while they are the same individuals1, their moral nature has been entirely transformed and their conception of the Person and Work of their Lord has immeasurably advanced2. Is a merely subjective experience an adequate explanation of such a change<sup>3</sup>?
- Moreover the circumstances of the appearances (c) themselves are inconsistent with the Theory of Visions:—For
  - (1) Their duration must have sometimes been protracted. A considerable space of time is presupposed4, when on the way to Emmaus He interpreted to the two disciples in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself (Luke xxiv. 27), and when just before His Ascension He conversed with the Eleven of the things concerning the kingdom of God (Acts i. 3).

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Those who saw our Lord in Gethsemane and on the Cross, and again upon the great Easter Sunday, cannot speak of the Resurrection without an enthusiasm which rises to almost lyrical rapture. Listen to S. John's conception of the self-consciousness of the Resurrection-life of the Risen Lord. I am the first and the last, and the ever-living, and I became dead, and behold! I am living to the ages of the ages. Now this joy of the disciples, attested by all the literature which remains upon the

- (3) They occurred first at Jerusalem, where the prevailing tone of feeling was critical and hostile, and in spite of the fact that the disciples had been led to believe that they would find our Lord in Galilee (Matt. xxviii. 7, 10).
- (4) They suddenly ceased¹ after forty days in spite alike of the promises of our Lord's abiding presence with the disciples, and of the stirring events of the day of Pentecost (Matt. xxviii. 20).

(β) The Resurrection Body.

xii. The Article next states that our Lord "toke agayne his body, with flesh, bones, and all thinges apparteyning to the perfection<sup>2</sup> of mans nature." We gather from the Gospel narrative that

(i) Our Lord did not at His Resurrection either

If the visions were the result of ecstasy, why did they not continue? Exactly at the moment, when enthusiasm may have been regarded as at its height, they suddenly cease, and when we should have expected they would have increased in number and become continuous, they come to an abrupt close, and give place to a life of healthy activity on the part of the Apostolic body and the believers generally. "Psychology would rather conclude that the action of that vibration, once set in motion by the Twelve in the whole body of the Church, would continue with increasing intensity, producing a life of enjoyment altogether ecstatic, than that it should have suddenly stopped, and given place to a life of healthy practical moral activity." Keim, The Historical Christ, p. 136; Milligan, The Resurrection, pp. 110—112.

- (a) exhibit an entire independence of material conditions as they are now known to us<sup>1</sup>, or (b) subject Himself to such conditions at special times and for special purposes<sup>2</sup>;
- (ii) He rose with a true human Body, even the particular Body proper to Himself as the Incarnate Word. Sight and contact were needed to convince the disciples of the verity and identity of the Body. They were sensible of flesh and bones, even of the very wound-prints, and our Lord invited them to handle Him and see for themselves (Luke xxiv. 36 sqq.; John xx. 27)3.
- (iii) Nevertheless His Body after His Resurrection had, without ceasing to be a true human Body, a certain independence of the conditions of time and space<sup>4</sup>. He comes we know not whence;

The Gospels describe the manifestations in such terms as (a) ἐφανερώθη, Mark xvi. 12, 14; John xxi. 14; (b) ἐφανέρωσεν ἐαυτόν, John xxi. 1; (c) παρέστησεν ἐαυτόν ζώντα, Acts i. 3. But they afford no ground for believing in any recurrence, however momentary, to pre-Resurrection conditions, such as the occasional resumption of a material body would seem

3 While Docetism has from the first thought to find for itself support in the circumstances of the Resurrection-Life of our Lord, the Church has insisted that the Resurrection diminished nothing of the verity of His Manhood. Thus Ignatius ad Trall. ix., δs καl άληθῶs ἡγέρθη ἀπὸ νεκρῶν; Origen, Contr. Cels. ii. 16, ὁ γὰρ ἀληθῶs ἀποθανών, el ἀνέστη, ἀληθῶs ἐνέστη.

<sup>4</sup> It is not sufficiently remembered that to describe a conquest of death at all, to portray the Conqueror, clothed in the mystery of the Resurrection Body, and in doing so to preserve the harmony of His moral attributes with all that has gone before, is a task transcending the art of the greatest master of poetry or fiction. "Shakespeare has rarely represented great souls of the departed as uttering more than a few words. The impression produced by their apparition is floated in to us through the language of the spectators rather than of the visitant. The presence of the Ghost in 'Hamlet' is felt in the statelier march and more solemn music of the lines which are spoken by those under the spell. But the language of the Ghost himself falls, on the whole, far short of the lofty and awful conception conveyed by the words of others, who impart to us the impression which the dramatist wishes us to form.....But the little company of disciples contained a writer whose invention was such as to raise him to the level of a perfect equality with the majestic conception

He goes we know not whither. Now He is with Mary of Magdala in the Garden. Now He is with the two on the road to Emmaus. Now He is by the Lake-side. Now He is on the appointed mountain. Such an independence of time and space had already in some degree been displayed previous to the Resurrection (Matt. xiv. 25; Mark vi. 48). But what had been hitherto, though fully potential, only partially actual, became more fully actual after the victory over death had been achieved1, and our Lord speaks of Himself after His Resurrection as possessing not "flesh and blood," but "flesh and bones" (Luke xxiv. 39)2.

If it be objected that the Humanity thereby ceases to be real, and that personal identity is destroyed, it may be replied that (a) an independence the same in kind, though less in degree, had been displayed already previous to the Resurrection, but this is not regarded as rendering the Humanity unreal; that (b) personal identity does not depend upon an identity of material particles existing in an

of a Risen God-so much at home with it that he fearlessly follows minute actions of this exalted being, and endows Him with sentence after sentence not unworthy of those Divine lips! Shakespeare himself could not have moved on these lofty ranges of imaginative fiction without an occasional breakdown, more especially as the joyous and triumphant freedom which is required for such high creations would have been fettered at every turn by the benumbing conviction that he was degrading his powers to the service of a lie." <sup>2</sup> Comp. Eph. v. 30 where the reading έκ της σαρκός αύτου, και έκ των δστέων αὐτοῦ is not without support. "The significant variation from the common formula 'flesh and blood' must have been at once intelligible to Jews, accustomed to the provisions of the Mosaic ritual, and nothing would have impressed upon them more forcibly the transfiguration of Christ's Body than the verbal omission of the element of Blood, which was for them the symbol and seal of corruptible life." Westcott, Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 162, n., and Revelation of identical mutual relation. We conclude, therefore, that our Lord's Resurrection Body was not less truly human in its new condition of freedom from the limitations of time and space.

(y) The Ascension.

xiii. The Ascension Body. The Article next asserts that the Resurrection Body was the same as that "wherewith our Lord ascended into heaven'." In other words it maintains the permanence of His Humanity<sup>2</sup>. This is a point on which the testimony of Scripture is plain. There is nothing to indicate that the Body with which the Lord's disciples beheld Him going into heaven (Acts i. 11)<sup>8</sup> was other than that with which He rose from the tomb, and this view is confirmed by the language of the Epistles. Thus

(i) The writer of that to the Hebrews bases much of his teaching on the permanence of Christ's Humanity. The very name, which he so characteristically applies to our Lord, Jesus, "the

3  $E\theta\epsilon\delta\sigma\alpha\sigma\theta\epsilon$ . The term quite naturally expresses sense-perception of an external object, but not equally naturally a subjective vision. Contrast the use of the term  $\theta\epsilon\alpha\mu\alpha$  with that of the substantive  $\delta\rho\alpha\mu\alpha$ , and we see the point of the use of the verb here. It is used in the same sense in 1 John 1.1.

See Westcott in loc.

<sup>1</sup> On the circumstances of the Ascension, see Introd. to the Creeds, pp. 164-166. "If the story of the Ascension had been of human invention, all we know of literature tells us how it would have been. Over the cradle there would have been silence, and a sky as hushed as a frozen sea. At the Ascension the air would have quivered with the melody, and the mountains have been shaken by the storm of the triumph. But because the narrative is true, the liturgical instincts of the evangelist are kept in check. The Church is supplied with no song for the Ascension-tide to form a counterpart to the 'Gloria in Excelsis.'...To the temple which the evangelist raises to the truth he will neither prefix a porch of romance, nor Christ in His Humanity<sup>1</sup>," and its frequent emphasis by position, implies as much.

(ii) For S. John it is one of the marks of the deceiver and the Antichrist that he does not confess that Fesus Christ cometh in the flesh (2 John 7)<sup>2</sup>.

(δ) The Heavenly Session.

xiv. Our Ascended Lord, the Article proceeds to declare, "sitteth" at the right hand of God. This follows from S. Mark's account of the Ascension, where he tells us that the Lord Jesus was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God (Mark xvi. 19). The same expression<sup>3</sup> occurs frequently in the Epistle to the Hebrews<sup>4</sup>, and S. Paul, regarding the action of the Father, writes God raised Christ from the dead, and set Him at His own right Hand in the heavenly regions (Eph. i. 20). Here we may note that the language used of the Heavenly Session is, perhaps, the one instance of simple anthropomorphism known to the theology of the New Testament and, consequently, to the Catholic Creeds. The extravagances founded upon it are familiar to us in art. Strictly

(e) The Second Advent.

xv. Until He return. The Article concludes with the statement that our Lord sitteth in heaven "until He return to judge all men at the last day." The word "until" does not imply that thenceforward our Lord will be divested of His peculiar royalty. It marks rather the point of transition from the Kingdom of Grace to the Kingdom of Glory, of which, as we say in the Nicene Creed, "there shall be no end4." The purpose of the second Advent is Schmidt quoted by Delitzsch on Heb. ix. 24. For the object of the Heavenly Session, see Introduction to the Creeds, pp. 170 sqq. We are not to conceive of His Session as though it implied a state of inactive rest. Rather our Lord maintains in heaven not a lessened, but a continual and heightened activity. He is there instated in the complete exercise of all the offices, and in the full enjoyment of all the privileges, belonging to Him as perfect Media-tor, Sovereign King, High Priest, and Arch-Prophet of God's Church and people. "He did initially and in part exercise those functions upon earth; and a ground of enjoying these preeminencies He laid here; but the entire execution and possession of all, He did obtain by His Ascension into heaven, and by His Session there." defined to be the Judgment of all men. That He will exercise this awful office is our Lord's own express declaration. Neither doth the Father, He saith, judge any man, but He hath given all judgment unto the Son ... and He gave1 Him authority to execute judgment because He is the Son of Man (John v. 22, 27)2. Judgment, Scripture teaches us, is the proper office of the Son in His Humanity. It belongs to Him as Mediator because He is both Son over His (Fehovah's) House (Heb. iii. 6), and Son of Man taken from among men (Heb. v. 1). Our Lord's express statement on this point is confirmed by the teaching of S. Paul, when he said to the Athenians on Mars' hill, God hath appointed a day, in which He will judge the world in righteousness by the Man whom He hath ordained (Acts xvii. 31), and in his Epistle to the Romans he speaks of the day, when God shall judge the secrets of men by Fesus Christ (Rom. ii. 16).

ARTICLE V.

Of the holy ghost.

Spiritus sanctus, à patre et filio procedens, eiusdem est cum patre et filio essentiæ, maiestatis, et gloriæ, uerus, ac æternus Deus.

The holy ghost, proceedyng from the father and the sonne, is of one substaunce, maiestie, and glorie, with the father and the sonne, very and eternall God.

- Connection. Having dealt with the first two Persons in the Blessed Trinity, the Article proceeds to complete the dogmatic statements respecting the Trinity, by treating of the Third Person, God the Holy Ghost.
- Source. The Fifth is the first Article that has no equivalent in the series of Edward VI., but was adopted in its entirety in 1562 from the Würtemberg Articles of 15521.
- iii. Object. Besides completing the dogmatic statements respecting the Trinity, the Fifth Article has for its object to refute the erroneous opinions current amongst many of the Anabaptist school, who reproduced the errors of Arius<sup>2</sup> and Macedonius<sup>3</sup> respecting the Holy Spirit, and of the Son, by consequence denied that of the Holy Spirit also, speaking of Him as the "creature of a creature, κτίσμα κτίσματος.

3 Macedonius taught that the Holy Ghost was διάκονον και ὑπηρέτην of the Father, such in fact as all the Holy Angels. Sozom. iv. 27.

denied His Personality and Deity<sup>1</sup>, representing Him as merely a Divine afflatus.

- iv. Analysis. The Article makes three statements respecting the third Person in the Trinity:
  - (i) "That He proceedeth from the Father and the Son":
  - (ii) "That He is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son":
  - (iii) "That He is very and eternal God."
- v. The Characteristic of the Holy Ghost. The First Person in the Blessed Trinity is, as we have seen? the sole Fountain of all being created and uncreated. The source of the Life of the Son is the Father, of Whom He is eternally begotten; His characteristic is Generation. The source of the life of the Spirit is the Father, from Whom He eternally proceeds; His characteristic is Procession. He is "neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceedings." The Greek verb ἐκπορεύεσθαι, which signifies "procession," occurs several times in the Gospels<sup>4</sup>, and is specially used in S. John's Gospel by our Lord of the Holy Ghost<sup>5</sup>.
- vi. He proceedeth from the Father, for He is called the Spirit of the Father (Matt. x. 20); He is represented as sent by the Father (John xiv. 26); He is described as given by the Father (John xiv. 16); and in express words it is said that He proceedeth from the Father's (John xv. 26).

6 Παρὰ τοί Πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται. The

There is an essential relation between the Procession and the Temporal Mission. The former may be inferred from the latter. In the words of S. Augustine, "Peter nusquam legitur missus"; for "the Father is made of none."

- vii. He proceedeth from the Son. Further, in the Western recension of the Nicene formula<sup>1</sup>, He is said to proceed from the Son, and so it is stated in this Article. For
  - (α) He is called the Spirit of Christ<sup>2</sup> (Rom. viii. 9);
  - (β) He is described as sent by the Son from the Father (John xv. 26);
  - ( $\gamma$ ) He is actually bestowed by the Son upon the Apostles (John xx. 22)<sup>3</sup>.

Thus while He is termed the Spirit of the Father, He is also termed the Spirit of Christ; while He is described as sent by the Father, He is also described as sent by the Son;

<sup>1</sup> For an account of this addition, see Introduction to the Creeds, p. 206, n.; Hagenbach's History of Doctrines, i. 371; ii. 204. The Council of Chalcedon had ordered that the Creed of Nicæa should be accepted by all orthodox churches throughout the world in the form in which it then stood (i.e. without the Filioque), and that no addition should be made thenceforward without the decision of a general Council. Now the Filioque clause never possessed such sanction. It is asserted dogmatically for the first time in a Spanish provincial Council (Toledo, A.D. 589), and seems to have been really admitted by mistake. Comp. Professor Swete's History of the Doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit, pp. 169, 170. "Both the King (Reccared) and his Bishops believed the words to be a true part of the original Faith." while He is represented as given by the Father, He is also represented as given by the Son, and can be spoken of as the Spirit of Jesus¹ (Acts xvi. 7). So also after the effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost S. Peter traces it to the fact that Jesus being exalted to the right hand of God, and having received the Spirit from the Father, had poured forth that which his hearers saw and heard (Acts ii. 33). He thus regards the Holy Ghost as bestowed by the Father upon men, but as coming to them through Christ. Similarly S. Paul writes to the Galatians, Because ye are sons, God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father (Gal. iv. 6)². These passages convey the truth, expressed by S. Basil, that the Church is "the Spirit-bearing Body" of the Ascended Lord.

viii. He proceedeth from the Father and the Son. When, then, according to the Western recension of the Nicene Creed, we say that the Holy Spirit "proceedeth from the Father," we mean that He proceeds from Him as the sole Fount of Deity<sup>3</sup>. When we say that He "proceedeth from the Son," we do not mean that He proceeds from the Son as from a source independent of the Father, but that, proceeding from the Father, He proceeds mediately through the Son. We do not allow that there are two Principles or two Causes in the Godhead. We believe in one original Principle and one original Cause, and this is the Father, to Whom all things owe their existence. The Son, who is consubstantial with the Father, is eternally begotten of Him, and owes all that He is and has to Him. The Procession, therefore, of the Holy Spirit is not from the Son as from a second fountain independent of the first. He proceeds "from the Father through the Son1," and "owes ultimately to the Father whatever belongs to Him as being the Spirit of the Son2." ix. Consubstantial and Co-Eternal. The Article next proceeds to state that the Holy Spirit is "of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the See Mason's Faith of the Gospel, pp. 220, 221. "A Catholic believer is free to confess that he cannot justify the way in which the Filioque clause was inserted by the Western Church, without the consent of the Eastern, into a Creed which was the joint heritage of all. He is bound also to acknowledge that as the clause stands, it needs guarding and qualifying. Yet it would seem like receding from the truth, if the words which assert the Double Procession of the Spirit were now to be struck out from the Creed. Western theologians agree that the Spirit does not proceed from the Son as from a second fountain independent of the first. Eastern theologians agree that the Spirit does not issue out from the Father without coming fluence of S. Augustine Western theologians have thought more of the indissoluble unity of will and operation in the Holy Trinity than of the precise constitution (to speak in human language) of each single Person. To them, therefore, the indifferent conjunction 'and' is preferable to the definiteness of the Greek preposition 'through.' And the difficulty which the Greeks raised against their phraseology, that it slurred over the unity of the source of Godhead, can hardly have been before their minds. To say that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son could not suggest to them a twofold origin or principle of Deity; it would simply affirm, with the indefiniteness of inadequate language, the cooperation of the Son in that which the Father does." Strong's Manual of Theology, p. 179. The phrase in the Athanasian Creed, "Spiritus Sanctus a Patre et Filio, non factus, nec creatus, nec genitus est, sed procedens," is sufficiently general to include the two senses in which the Holy Spirit proceeds (i) from the Father, and (ii) from, i.e. through, the Son.

Son." For He is not only the Personal Power of God, but truly and essentially God. He is repeatedly indicated as such in Holy Scripture. Thus we find

- (a) Divine works are ascribed to Him, such as Creation (Ps. xxxiii. 6), the new Birth (John iii. 3, 5), the inspiration of Holy Scripture (2 Pet. i. 21);
- (β) Divine properties are declared to be His. He is eternal (Heb. ix. 14); He is omniscient (I Cor. ii. 10); He is omnipotent (Luke i. 35); He is all-sovereign (I Cor. xii. 11);
- (γ) Divine homage is rendered to Him in the Baptismal Formula (Matt. xxviii. 19), and in the Apostolic Benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14).

Hence in the Nicene Creed He is truly termed "The Lord," i.e. "Jehovah," and in the Athanasian Creed He is described as being equally with the Father and the Son "uncreate, infinite, eternal, all-sovereign, God, and Lord<sup>1</sup>."

- x. Very and Eternal God. The same argument applies to the statement of the Article that He is very and eternal God. But to it may be added the fact that in Holy Scripture not only are Divine works ascribed to Him, but
  - (I) Failure to recognise Him is placed on a parallel with failure to recognise God Himself (I Cor. iii. 16);
  - (2) To lie unto Him is to lie unto God (Acts v. 3, 4);
  - (3) To tempt Him is to tempt God (Acts v. 9)2;

- (4) Our bodies, which are said by S. Paul to be the temples of God (I Cor. iii. 16), are also the temples of the Holy Ghost (I Cor. vi. 19);
- (5) Sin against the Holy Ghost has a singular atrocity, it is the only irremissible sin (Matt. xii. 31, 32).

These passages all tend to confirm the doctrine of the Deity<sup>1</sup> of the Holy Spirit, and we believe and confess that such as the Father is, such is the Son, and such is the Holy Ghost, very and eternal God<sup>2</sup>.

- i. Connection. Having thus treated of the Revelation of Himself, which God has been pleased to make to us, the Articles proceed to deal with the Rule of Faith1. To this subject three Articles relate, the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth. The first two treat of Holy Scripture, the third of the three Creeds.
- ii. History and Language. The present Sixth Article differs considerably from the original draft in 1553. In the first Clause, which was apparently modelled on the Fifth of the old Forty-two Articles of 1552, after the words "nor may be proved thereby," a sentence is omitted which ran thus, "although it be sometime received of the faithful, as Godlie, and profitable for an ordre and comelinesse." The second Clause, which relates to the testimony of the

Church in determining what Books are Canonical, as also the actual list of the Canonical Books, was lacking in the first draft. These clauses were introduced in 1563 from the Würtemberg Confession<sup>1</sup>.

- iii. Object. The object of the Article is a twofold one. It was designed
  - (1) To assert the necessity of proving from Scripture the doctrines of the Church in opposition to the tendency of extremists to deprecate a reference to its authority in matters of faith2;
  - (2) To condemn the error of those ultra-spiritualists, who denied the necessity of the Written Word altogether, and looked with suspicion on all "Book-Religion" as they termed it, attributing all light and knowledge to the internal illumination of the Holy Spirit3.
  - iv. Analysis. The Article consists of three parts:-
    - It asserts the plenary authority of Holy Scripture, as the ultimate standard of Christian Faith and Morals:
    - It defines the extent and limits of such Holy  $(\beta)$ Scripture, as comprising the Canonical Books of the Old and New Testaments:
    - It lays down what is the position of the Church of England as regards the Ecclesiastical Books.

i. The Plenary Authority of Holy Scripture.

- v. The Sufficiency of Scripture. All communities of Christians agree in this, that the Divine Rule is contained in Holy Scripture<sup>1</sup>. They differ as to the authority of an Ecclesia Docens. Necessarily there must be something analogous to the latter, even in the smallest sect. The danger lies in the direction of substituting an independent for an interpretative authority. Undoubtedly this danger, always insidious, is contemplated here. The intention is not to dispense with an Ecclesia Docens, but to indicate its proper function and to insist upon its responsibility for fulfilling the same<sup>2</sup>.
- vi. Testimony of our Lord and His Apostles. Our Lord and His Apostles nowhere refer for the establishment of doctrine to any authority but Holy Scripture:
  - (i) Our Lord Himself constantly appealed to the Old Testament, and there is hardly a Book contained in it from which He did not quote. Again and again He appealed to the Jewish Scriptures as testifying of Himself, and after His Resurrection He expounded them to His disciples, shewing that from first to last they pointed to Himself (Luke xxiv. 27);
  - (ii) The Apostles likewise bear the same testimony to the Jewish Scriptures. Thus
    - (a) S. Luke praises the Berœans because they examined the Scriptures daily to see whether

dom, p. 37.

The Greek Church also acknowledges a so-called tradition as a coordinate source of Christian knowledge, but this relates chiefly to ecclesiastical points, such as the veneration of saints and relics, the forty days' fast, the institution of Monachism, prayers for the dead, &c. Διαιρείται τὸ θεῖον ῥῆμὰ τε εἰς τὸ γραπτὸν καὶ ἄγραφον μὲν εἶεν ἂν αὶ ἐκκλησιαστικαὶ παραδόσεις. See Winer, Confessions of Christendom, p. 38.

- they agreed with the statements which S. Paul made to them (Acts xvii. 11)1;
- That Apostle, writing to the Romans, says, (B) Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that through patience and comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope2 (Rom. xv. 4);
- Again he writes to Timothy, From a babe  $(\gamma)$ thou hast known the sacred writings3, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Fesus, and he adds, Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness: that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work (2 Tim. iii. 15—17).

Thus the Old Testament was received and appealed to as Scripture alike by our Lord and His Apostles, and when He ascribes error to ignorance of the Scriptures (Matt. xxii. 29)6, He is plainly referring His hearers to God's written Word, as the only valid foundation for their convictions as to faith and conduct?

vii. The New Testament was gradually added to the Old, but it was some considerable period after our Lord's Ascension before any of the Books contained in it were actually written. The first work of the Apostles, and that out of which all their other functions grew, was to proclaim as heralds the Glad Tidings of the Great Hope, which had arisen for mankind, and to deliver a personal testimony to the chief facts of the Gospel History respecting the life, death, and resurrection of their Lord (Mark xvi. 15; Acts i. 21, 22)1. Thus the teaching of the Apostles was in the first instance oral and not written2, and out of the multitude of things that Jesus did (John xxi. 25), a cycle of representative facts was gradually selected, which formed the common groundwork of their message3. But in the course of time another step was taken. Many, as S. Luke expressly tells us, endeavoured to commit to writing this oral Gospel, and to form in a connected shape written collections of the words and actions of our Lord (Luke i, 1-4). As long as the Twelve Apostles were ject Tradition, but He assigned to it its proper place as compared with Scripture, much in the same way as He asserted His own proper authority as the Interpreter of Scripture. The due relations had become inverted. It was His Divine Mission to readjust them, and to declare that Scripture was not to be exclusively dominated by the stereotyped phraseology of Tradition. 1 Bp Westcott, Bible in the Church,

p. 57.
Of the way in which the Apostles taught we have two examples (i) in the preaching of S. Peter before Cornelius (Acts x. 37-43), and (ii) in that of S. Paul in the Synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia (Acts xiii. 23—39). See Westcott's Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, pp. 163-165.
3 "The Founder of the Christian Church did not write Himself, nor did

He give His disciples a commission to write. They were to go from place to place bearing witness everywhere personally by word of mouth, and claiming to be heard, and so to carry His message and form communities. When He promised them the assistance of the Holy Ghost, He was not thinking of authorship, but of the cases where they would have to speak. And even in that last solemn moment of departure, when He gave His last charges including all their Apostolic duties, there was no men-tion made of writing books. So, again, was it when S. Paul was called to the Apostolate. And among the charismata he reckons a prophetic gift, but no special gift of writing." Döllinger, First Age of the Church, vol. i., pp. 201, 202.

living, they were themselves abiding witnesses to the facts which they preached. But when the time came for them to be scattered throughout the world, or to depart from this earthly scene, it became a matter of the highest importance that authoritative records should be put forth by those who had exceptional knowledge of the events they described<sup>1</sup>, to supply the place of the oral teaching previously in use<sup>2</sup>. Thus documents were made which form the substance of the present Gospels and of the Book of Acts. Various conditions in the history of the Church called for Epistles, some of which were encyclical, while others were addressed to particular communities or individuals<sup>3</sup>.

viii. Claim of the Apostles. But though the writings of the New Testament came into existence under these circumstances, the writers, instead of appealing to any other independent and coordinate authority, make the same claim for what they wrote, as they do for the Scriptures of the Old Testament. This we say to you by the word of the Lord, S. Paul writes to the Thessalonians (I Thess. iv. 15). Which things also we speak, he says to Every one wrote as the particular occasion required, to supply the want of personal intercourse, to confirm what had been taught already by word of mouth, to answer questions, resolve doubts, denounce errors and evil customs, in short to do the very thing which was best and oftenest done by word of mouth. Paul attached greater weight to hisoral teaching, to sight and speech, than to his writings." Comp. Rom. i. 11; I Thess. iii. 10. Döllinger, First Age of the Church, i. pp. 202, 203.

the Corinthians, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth (I Cor. ii. 13). The things which I write unto you, he says again, they are the commandment of the Lord 1 (I Cor. xiv. 37). Once more, writing to the Galatians, he says, I make known unto you, brethren, as touching the Gospel, which was preached by me, that it is not after man. For neither did I receive it from man, nor was I taught it2, but it came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ (Gal. i. 11, 12). These strong assertions arise, perhaps, out of the exceptional conditions both of the writer and of the readers. S. Paul speaks as one conscious that he is under the guidance and suggestion of the Holy Spirit, as much as the writers of the Old Testament3.

ix. Tradition. Thus, laying down no theory of Inspiration, the compilers of the Article declared that "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation4." The Roman Church, however, appears to hold a doctrine regarding the unwritten word of God, or tradition, of such

The Kuptov, as its position indicates, is emphatic. a character as to weaken the obligation of ultimate reference to the written Word. "The truth of the Christian Revelation is contained in the written Word and in the unwritten Tradition." Again, "the Council receives and venerates with an equal feeling of piety and reverence all the Books of the Old and New Testaments...and also the traditions relating as well to faith as to morals, as having been, either from the word of Christ Himself, or the dictation of the Holy Ghost, preserved by continuous succession in the Catholic Church1." This risks making the Ecclesia Docens independent instead of interpretative, as though Scripture were not the sole source of Catholic truth, and as though an Article of the Faith might rest on Church teaching alone, as a sufficient basis in itself<sup>2</sup>. Such were a departure from the primitive conception of the authority of Scripture. For on turning to

- Again S. Chrysostom writes, "Look for no other teacher, thou hast the oracles of God; none teaches thee like these2."
- Once more S. Augustine says, "In those things which are plainly laid down in Scripture, all things are found, which embrace faith and morals8"

Such quotations might be greatly multiplied. Those given are sufficient to shew that the Fathers of the Primitive Church found the Rule of Faith (a) in the Bible as its sole source, and (b) in the Creeds as interpreting the Bible. They did not appeal to some independent tradition<sup>5</sup>,

The English Church is by her consistent appeal to history pledged to respect Catholic Tradition; she deals with it by the golden rule of St Vincent of Lerins, the "quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omni-bus." The statement that "dogma has triumphed over history" is as alien from her spirit, as is that doctrine of private judgment of which it is but a correct expression. Yet the English Church is, by her freedom from foreclosure, equally respectful of the manifold qualitative progress of the race. "The Faith, in which Christianity is embodied, and through which it acts, grows as humanity grows," commending itself to the ἡγεμονικοί και παιδευτικοί of each successive generation, while its facts remain unchanged and its principles are final. ## ii. The Canonical Scriptures.

xi. The Canon. Having laid down the plenary authority of Holy Scripture in matters of doctrine, the Article proceeds to deal with the vexed question of the Canon, and to define the extent and limits of Holy Scripture. The Holy Scriptures, it states, are comprised in those Canonical Books, both of the Old and New Testaments, of whose authority, that is, in matters of faith, was never any doubt in the Church. The word "Canon," having passed through various meanings3, was used in the

While the Anglican Church accepts a Hermeneutical and Ecclesiastical Tradition "she seeks to protect the faithful against the enforcement on them, as requisite to salvation, of individual opinions, which being without the authentication of Church authority, have consequently no Scriptural authority. Any accretive development. that would add to the substance of the faith, would be condemned by this Article, but it would not condemn the enunciation by legitimate authority of any doctrine deduced from the ori-ginal deposit." Bp Forbes, pp. 98, 99.

2 "Where an opinion has been held commonly in Christendom for a while and then abandoned, without being explicitly condemned, as being out of harmony with Scripture and reason, like the notion of Christ's offering His death as a ransom to the Devil, then we shall not scruple to reject what lacks permanent Church authority and Scriptural basis. Where finally doctrines, lacking any Scriptural war-rant, come to prevail only in a later age of the Church, and only partially then, like the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, or of Indulgences on the basis of the Treasury of Merits, doctrines ignored or rejected explicitly in the earlier ages, then, even without condemning them as positively heretical, we shall have no hesitation in declining them with emphatic decision." - xii. The Canon of the Old Testament was inherited by the Christian from the Jewish Church, but it has come down to us in a twofold form:—

  - (α) We have the Hebrew Canon, containing only the Books which this Article admits to be Canonical. These are the Books which (1) were received by the Jews of Palestine, (2) were quoted by our Lord and His Apostles, and (3) are accepted by modern Jews¹.
  - (β) We have the Septuagint or Greek Version, which contains, besides the generally accepted Scriptures, certain other Books, which were incorporated with the Books of the Hebrew Canon, and so claimed to be equally inspired.

Up to the date of the Council of Trent the question of the Canon was open, and the single great exception to the opinion of the early Fathers, who accepted the Hebrew Canon, was that of S. Augustine<sup>2</sup>. This Father includes in the Canon of Scripture those additional Books found in the Septuagint Version, and his enlarged Canon was adopted at the Council of Carthage A.D. 397. While the Reformed Communities accepted only the Hebrew Canon as having any real weight in establishing matters of faith, the Council of Trent, though not without opposition,

The word was first used to designate the Holy Scriptures by S. Athanasius, who speaks of "this definite body of writings as canonized, that is, accepted."

which is distinctly recognised, and it is supported by the combined authority of those Fathers, whose critical judgment is entitled to the greatest weight.

pronounced the enlarged Greek Canon, including the Ecclesiastical Books, to be deserving in all its parts of equal veneration, and added a list of Books to prevent "the possibility of doubt."

xiii. The Hebrew Canon of the Old Testament corresponds with our present English Bible, and that it was the one quoted by our Lord and His Apostles may be thus proved. (1) Our present English Old Testament corresponds with the Hebrew Old Testament of the modern Jews; (2) that corresponds with the List given in the Babylonian1 Talmud of A.D. 550; (3) that with Jerome's Version A.D. 400; (4) that with Origen's Hexapla A.D. 200; (5) that with the Catalogue given by Melito, Bishop of Sardis, A.D. 160; (6) and that with the List of Books supplied by Josephus A.D. 70, who tells us that a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures was preserved in the Temple, and was there till the hour of its destruction, when he was 33 years of age. To the Temple the Jewish historian had ready access, and his testimony as to the contents of this copy is very valuable, for it shows that the Scriptures<sup>2</sup> we now possess are the same as those accepted by the Jews of our Lord's time, and we know on the authority of Philo and of Josephus himself that the Jews "would rather die ten thousand deaths" than suffer any alteration to be introduced into their sacred Books.

xiv. The Canon of the New Testament. As regards the Books of the New Testament there is no difference between the Church of England and any other section of the Church in respect to the number of Books that are to be admitted into the Canon. "All the Books of the New Testament," the Article declares, "as they are commonly received, we do receive, and account them Canonical," and this statement is not followed by any list of Books, as in the case of the Old Testament and the Apocrypha. The consentient testimony of the Church from the earliest days is thus taken as the ground on which we accept the writings of the New Testament, and recognise their claim to form part of Holy Scripture. The early Church was specially qualified to give security for and to pronounce on the authenticity of the various Books. For

- (i) In the first age of the Church the Apostles were actually alive while many of the Sacred Books were in process of writing;
- (ii) Instead of being hidden away, these Books were publicly used<sup>1</sup>, and copies of them were multiplied everywhere;
- (iii) Owing to the constant intercourse between the various Churches, it was easy for each Church to know which were the authentic writings and which were not;
- (iv) The very schisms and divisions, which took place, made each Church a check upon the others, and thus increased the number of independent witnesses; publicly read on the Lord's Day in the assemblies both in town and country. Just. Mart. Apol. i. 67.

- (v) In the course of time Collections began to be drawn up of Books acknowledged as Apostolic and authoritative, and "Versions" or Translations began to be made into many languages2.
- xv. Early Versions. The oldest example, perhaps, of these Versions is the Peshitto or Syriac Version of the New Testament. It was probably made for the Syrian Church of Edessa and the neighbourhood about the middle of the second century. In its earliest form it seems to have contained all the Books of our New Testament Canon, with the exception of 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and the Apocalypse<sup>3</sup>. This version has an especial interest because its language represents the vernacular spoken in Palestine at the time of the Apostles. Almost contemporary with this ancient Syriac Version was the old Latin Version, the Vetus Itala4. It was the Bible of the early African Churches, in the north of which country Christianity had been planted very early and had greatly flourished. It contained all the Books of our present Canon, except the Epistle to the Hebrews, James, and 2 Peter. The testimony of these Versions has a special value; because (a) they

the Epistle to the Hebrews, which is due probably to the fragmentary and corrupt state of the Ms., beginning, as it does, in the middle of a sentence referring to S. Mark's Gospel. See Salmon's Introduction to the New Testament, pp. 47–53; Westcott's Bible in the Church, pp. 115, 116.

It was the Peshitto or "Simple Version" of the West, habitually used by Tertullian. Westcott's Bible in the Church, p. 128.

Of such collections we have a remarkable specimen in the famous Muratorian Fragment on the Canon, so called as being first published by Muratori, A.D. 1740, from a Ms. in the Ambrosian Library of Milan, which had belonged originally to the great Irish monastery of Bobbio. The date of the original, of which it is a copy, was between A.D. 160—170, and it probably represents the Canon in use among Western Churches at the time of its composition. It contains in its Gospels, the Acts, thirteen Epistles of S. Paul, 1 and 2 John, Jude and the Apocalypse. It omits the Epistles of James, 3 John, 1 and 2 Peter, and represent the official and public approbation of Churches; (b) they introduce no Apocryphal Book; (c) taken together they exclude no Book found in our present Canon except the second Epistle of S. Peter; (d) they show how early the need was felt and satisfied of extending to foreign Churches a knowledge of those Greek Apostolic writings, which were regarded as sacred and authoritative.

xvi. The Testimony of Eusebius. We have not space to do more than allude to the quotations from the New Testament in the writings of the great Fathers of the Church in the East and the West, or to the results of the persecution of Diocletian in A.D. 3032, which, in spite of the surrender of the Sacred Books in many instances, "left the African Churches in possession of a complete and pure New Testament." We pass on to the important testimony of Eusebius, the historian of the early centuries of the Church. In a celebrated passage of his History (iii. 25) he arranges the sacred writings of the New Testament in three classes; (1) the Homologoumena3, or "Acknowledged Books"; (2) the Antilegomena4, or "Disputed Books"; (3) the Notha, or "Spurious Books". This language illustrates the great care and caution exercised in the matter of admitting Books into the Canon. Everyone, who dealt with the question, appealed to usage, tradition, and antiquity, the Bible, p. 30.

See Euseb. Hist. Eccl. viii. 2. The decree for the confiscation of the sacred Christian writings, which constituted an ingenious part of the persecutor's policy, defeated its own pur-pose; it advertised to the whole world the influence of the acknowledged Christian Scriptures, and forced upon the attention of the Church their infinite superiority as compared with all other ecclesiastical writings. <sup>3</sup> The "Homologoumena" include but not to any definite decree. At length, at the Synod of Laodicea, A.D. 363, and at the still more important Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, decrees were issued respecting the Books of the New Testament, and the question of the Canon, being now taken out of the domain of criticism, was settled by the authority of the Christian Church, and the contents of the New Testament, as we now have them, were formally accepted.

iii. The Apocrypha1.

xvii. The Apocryphal Books form part, as we have seen, of the sacred literature of the Alexandrian Jews and are found mingled with the Hebrew Scriptures in the ancient copies of the Septuagint. They are the product of the age subsequent to the Captivity, and had their origin partly in Babylonia, partly in Palestine and Egypt, and possibly in other countries. They belong to the last three centuries before Christ, when prophecy and direct Biblical Revelation had ceased. The New Testament writers, who frequently quote the Alexandrine Version, never make dogmatic use of these writings as Scripture, although they may be supposed to have been not unacquainted with the contents of some of them. The writers of the early terial, and 'Apocryphal' being commonly identified with 'supposititious' or 'fictitious,' it is commonly imagined that the 'Apocrypha' literature is unworthy of thoughtful study. The word 'Apocrypha' originally denoted writings of 'secret character' or 'unknown authorship,' but, from Jerome's day, grew to be the mere label applied to the miscellaneous group of 'ecclesiastical books' that were read in the Churches, but were not included in the strict limits of the Hebrew Canon of Scripture." From a paper of the Rev. Professor Ryle at the Exeter Church Congress, 1894.

Church<sup>1</sup> did not generally follow their example, and the influence of the Greek and Latin Versions, in which no difference was discernible between the Hebrew Books and the Alexandrine additions, naturally predisposed the Church in favour of their use.

xviii. The Latin Vulgate naturally did much to extend this use, and still more the Conciliar recognition they first received at the Third Synod of Carthage, A.D. 397. The Council of Trent established the acceptance in the Canon of all Books contained in the Vulgate Version, and thus declared them to be of dogmatic authority. The Protestant communities unanimously agreed in accepting only the Hebrew Canon, as having real weight in establishing matters of faith. The judgment, however, which they pronounced, was expressed in varied terms in the different Confessions. In the Lutheran symbols there is found no decided negative, though they do in fact declare the Hebrew Canon alone to be of final authority<sup>2</sup>.

xix. The English Church, besides giving a list of the Ecclesiastical Books, appeals directly to the opinion of S. Jerome<sup>3</sup>, and concedes to them a "use for example of life and instruction of manners," but not for the establishment of doctrine. Hence while she has restricted their use in the Prayer Book<sup>1</sup>, and finds no valid reason for accepting their dogmatic authority, yet she regards them as of high value<sup>2</sup> for the information they contain<sup>3</sup>, for the respect they have received from the earliest ages, for the important links which they supply between the Old and New Testaments, and for the light they throw upon several customs and circumstances alluded to in the Gospels and Epistles<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> On the question of reading the Apocrypha in Church see Hooker Eccl. Pol. v. 20, 7, and the quotation he gives from Rusinus in Symb. A post. 38. Passages from Tobit and Wisdom are quoted as Scripture in the Homilies, and sentences from Tobit are still retained in our Communion Office. According to the New Lectionary though passages in Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom, and Baruch are appointed to be read between Oct. 27 and Nov. 18 and on certain Saints' Days, The Story of Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon and other parts have been eliminated. It is to be noticed that the Article includes in the Ecclesiastical Books 3 and 4 Esdras, and the Prayer of Manasses, which are not reckoned in the Canon by the Council of Trent.

<sup>2</sup> It is to be noticed that the Article assumes the Apocrypha to be amongst the "Biblia" or Scriptures by referring to them as "the other Books," only carefully distinguishing them as the Non-Canonical or Ecclesiastical Scriptures from the Canonical Scriptures, and explaining the proper au-

ing.

3 The Apocryphal Books "set before the Church in vivid pictures the working of the old Dispensation throughout the Jewish world at times when there was 'no prophet more.' They witness alike to what Judaism could do and to what it could not do. They prove by contrast that the Books of the Hebrew Canon, as a whole, are generically distinct from the ordinary religious literature of the Jews; and establish more clearly than anything else the absolute originality of the Gospel." 4 The Swiss war of Liberty and the Rise of the Dutch Republic are alone comparable for pure patriotism and religious fervour, with the great struggle of the Maccabæan War. Without some knowledge of that struggle, that triumph of Judaism and repulse of Hellenism, the literature, the thought, the history of the Jews in the following century are unintelligible. 1563.

De Veteri Testamento.

Of the Olde Testament.

Testamentum vetus Nouo contrarium non est, quandoquidem tam in veteri quàm nouo, per Christum, qui vnicus est mediator Dei et hominum, Deus et Homo, æterna vita humano generi est proposita. Quare malè sentiunt, qui veteres tantùm in promissiones temporarias sperasse confingunt. Quanquam Lex à Deo data per Mosen, quoad Ceremonias et ritus, Christianos non astringat, neque ciuilia eius præcepta in aliqua Republica necessariò recipi debeant: nihilominus tamen ab obedientia mandatorum, quæ Moralia vocantur, nullus quantumuis Christianus est solutus.

The olde Testament is not contrary to the newe, for both in the olde and newe Testament euerlastyng lyfe is offered to mankynde by Christe, who is the onlye mediatour betweene God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be hearde whiche faigne that the olde fathers dyd looke onlye for transitorie promises, Although the lawe genen from God by Moyses, as touchyng ceremonies and rites, do not bynde Christian men, nor the ciuile preceptes therof, ought of necessitie to be receased in any common wealth: yet notwith-standyng, no Christian man whatsoeuer, is free from the obedience of the commaundementes, whiche are called morall.

i. Connection. The Sixth Article treated of the Bible as a whole, and of the Canonical Scriptures as possessed of dogmatic authority. The present Article deals with the relation of the Old Testament to the New. Upon this point there was much difference of opinion in the Sixteenth Century. Many of the Anabaptists, not only on the continent but even in England, held that the authority of the Old Testament had been entirely abrogated by that of the New¹. They taught that the prophets wrote only penitus habent, omnia quæ in illo posita sunt ad prisca majorum nostrorum tempora referentes." Reform. Leg. Eccl. de Heresibus, c. 4. for the people of the old Dispensation; that their doctrine pertained only to their own time; and that the moral Law was not binding on Christian men<sup>1</sup>. They thus denied that the Jewish system was vitally connected with the Christian, and affirmed that the men of old time looked for no more than transitory promises, and had not even the faintest expectation of a life beyond the present<sup>2</sup>.

ii. History and Language. The original title of the Article in 1553 was "The Old Testament is not to be refused," and the Article consisted only of the first two clauses. The present third clause formed a portion of the old Nineteenth Article, which was entitled, "All men are bound to keep the moral commandments of the Law." This was transposed to its new position as the concluding clause of the Seventh Article in 1563.

iii. Analysis. The Article consists of three parts:-

- (I) It states that "the Old Testament is not contrary to the New," and gives the reason for this view;
- (2) It affirms that they are not to be listened to, who pretend that "the old fathers did look only for transitory promises";
- (3) It declares that though the Law given to Moses does not bind Christian men as regards rites and ceremonies, and although "the civil precepts thereof ought not of necessity to be received in any commonwealth; yet notwithstanding, no Christian man whatsoever is free from obedience to the Commandments which are called Moral."

iv. Proof of the first Statement:—The first Statement thus put forward may be proved (a) from the testimony of the Scriptures themselves, and  $(\beta)$  from that of the early Fathers.

i. The testimony of the Scriptures.

- (a) The Authority of the Old Testament is distinctly acknowledged in the New. Our Lord Himself repeatedly quotes the Old Testament, and He said to the Jews of His day, Ye search the Scriptures<sup>1</sup>, i.e. the Scriptures of the Old Covenant, and these are they which bear witness of Me (John v. 39);
- (b) Christ is ever represented as the Centre and Meeting-point of both Testaments<sup>2</sup>, and while the Old Testament points onward to Him as destined to come, the New Testament proclaims Him as actually come<sup>3</sup>;

1 Έρευνατε = search, or, better, ye search (see R.V.), τὰς γραφάς, ὅτι ὑμεῖς δοκεῖτε ἐν αὐταῖς ζωήν αἰώνιον ἔχειν καὶ ἐκεῖναὶ εἰσιν αὶ μαρτυροῦσαι περὶ ἐμοῦ. The reproach here lies not in their searching the Scriptures, but in their searching to so little purpose. Ὑμεῖς is emphatic, because ye are the people who think that in them ye have eternal life, "quia vos putatis in ipsis vitam æternam habere" Vulg.

<sup>2</sup> Comp. Heb. i. 1, 2 where God, Who of old time spake unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners is declared to have spoken unto us at the end of these days in His Son. The teaching of the Old Revelation was conveyed πολυμερῶς καὶ πολυτρόπως, multifariam, multisque modis (Vulg.), in successive portions, and in varying fashions, according to the needs and capacities of those who received it.

"The former revelation was given of old time, in the infancy and growth of the world: the Christian Revelation at the end of these days, on the very verge of the new order which of necessity it ushered in." Bp Westcott on Heb. i. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Or as S. Augustine puts it in well-known words "Novum Testamentum in Vetere latet, Vetus Testamentum in Novo patet." "Ante adventum Domini Nostri Jesu Christi," writes the same Father, "quo humilis venit in carne, præcesserunt justi, sic in Eum credentes venturum quomodo nos credimus in Eum qui venit. Tempora variata sunt, non fides...alium sonum habet 'venturus est,' alium sonum habet 'venit'; eadem tamen fides utrosque conjungit, et eos qui venturum esse, et eos qui Eum venisse crediderunt." S. Aug. Tract. xlv. in Joann.

(c) The Old Testament Dispensation proved, in the words of S. Paul, a tutor1 to bring men to Christ, and this it did in two ways, (1) by prophecy, (2) by types and symbols.

(I) By prophecy:

- (a) The first promise of a Saviour is the starting-point of the History of Redemption, and irradiates the gloom of the Fall (Gen. iii. 15). In terms the Promise was quite indefinite. Neither the time, nor the method, nor the precise mediating cause of man's deliverance was made known. It was not revealed whether the Promised Seed should be one or many, the collective race or a single deliverer2. But in process of time it was restricted through one of the sons of Noah to the race of Shem (Gen. ix. 26, 27); through Abraham to a particular nation, that of his descendants, the Jews (Gen. xii. 2, 3)3; through one of the sons of Jacob to a particular tribe, that of Judah 4 (Gen. xlix. 9, 10).
- Hitherto no personal trait of the destined Deliverer had been given. This began with

2 "Still with all its uncertainty as to the mode in which this End shall be effected, the promise had within it a principle of Hope and Encouragement, and the materials of a religious trust fitted to keep man still looking to his Maker." Davison On Prophecy, p. 55. The words foretell that man shall overcome the powers of evil, through himself suffering in the conflict. And this was only finally and perfectly fulfilled in the Son of Man.

3 The specific promise—"in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth beblessed"-refers primarily to the nation descended from Abraham as a whole: its perfect fulfilment is seen only in Him, who in His sacred humanity is the perfect Flower of the nation.

The uncertainty of the meaning of the word "Shiloh" here is shewn by the alternatives given in the margin of the Revised Version.

Moses, for when the people terrified at the thunderings and lightnings which accompanied the giving of the Law asked that he would be their mediator, Moses predicted the coming of a greater Prophet and a mightier Lawgiver<sup>1</sup> (Deut. xviii. 15—19). About the same time the unwilling testimony of a heathen seer centres the hopes of the world definitely in Palestine, and the witness of Balaam confirms the promise of the Hebrew Lawgiver (Num. xxiv. 17). When the sceptre rises from Judah, and David sits upon his throne, he himself speaks of the coming of a greater King, of whose dominion there shall be no end (Ps. ii.; xlv.: lxxii.; cx.)2.

<sup>2</sup> See Westcott's Introduction to the New Testament, p. 87; Davison On Prophecy, p. 205. We have in Ps. cx. the most vivid presentation of the truth that the expected King is God's vice-gerent.

3 This is a most vital aspect of the character and work of the true Messiah. The title "Servant of Jehovah" is applied to our Lord by S. Peter Acts iii. 26; iv. 27, 30. "In the last period of his long ministry Isaiah's prediction of the promised Messiah, not as an unoccupied Sovereign of man, but as the Servant of God, toiling, misunderstood, insulted, suffering, yet eventually triumphant, was an inspired picture which could not

This promise received partial fulfilment in the successive members of the great race of prophets whom God sent to His people. But not even the greatest of them was "like unto," i.e. the equal of, Moses. For the expectation of a prophet in our Lord's time see Matt. xvi. 14; Mark vi. 15; Luke ix. 7, 8, 9; John i. 21, 25; vii. 40, 41.

When the nation goes into captivity, the very sadness of the exile serves to correct the idea of the promised Messiah, and "the Son of David" gives place in the writings of Daniel to the Son of Man (Dan. vii. 13).

- $(\delta)$ Meanwhile another voice, not jubilant and glad, but sad and mournful begins to be heard. It speaks of triumph, but of triumph through suffering; of the coming of a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, of His being bruised for our iniquities, of His being stricken for the transgressions of His people (Isai. liii. 3-10). Zechariah again predicts that the Messiah shall be smitten (Zech. xiii. 7)1, and Daniel describes Him as cut off, but not for Himself (Dan. ix. 26), while the Psalmist foretells that the kings of the earth shall set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against His Anointed (Ps. ii. 2), and how men shall part His garments among them and cast lots upon His vesture (Ps. xxii. 18), and give Him gall for His meat, and in His thirst give Him vinegar to drink (Ps. lxix. 21)2.
- (2) By types and symbols:—
  - (a) Thus from Moses to Malachi the Hebrew

but leave its mark on the mind of Israel." Liddon's Advent Sermons, ii. p. 332.

<sup>1</sup> Zech. xiii. 7 represents the judgment of God as falling for the sake of the people on the King, the Shepherd of the people, Whom He has brought into close fellowship with Himself.

The passage is directly predictive of the Messiah's sufferings; for it is the King suffering, and suffering for His people, that is set before us. Comp. Dan. ix, 26.

<sup>2</sup> See Davison On Prophecy, p. 289; Cardinal Newman's Grammar of Assent, p. 441. Scriptures are, as it were, "one long-drawn sigh of sorrowful hope1." But while the prophets intimated that the expected Messiah should triumph and yet should die, Moses intimated the same fact by a system of symbolic sacrifices and typical ordinances. which he was commanded to institute<sup>2</sup>. And the same Scriptures, which portray the attributes of the one true God in the purest and most spiritual form, and enounce the simplest and sublimest code of human duties, contain the most minute and elaborate directions respecting the slaughtering of a lamb or other victim, and set forth with equal earnestness the equal necessity of presenting the Burnt Offering, the Sin Offering, and the Peace Offering<sup>3</sup>. Again these Scriptures, while they describe the form of the one everlasting Essence under the veil of attributes that are themselves unfathomable, prescribe day by day, and year by year, a series of visible and impressive services4, which by their constant repetition and recurrence proclaimed their own inefficacy, and testified that they were

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;The nation may be said to possess an outward worship just in order that it may transcend it and look down upon it....Hence the last outcome of the life of the nation was, on the one hand, the Levitical Law which hedged round the life of the Jewish devotee with the minutest prescriptions of outward service and ritual, and, on the other hand, the Book of Psalms, which expresses in language that the highest Christian devotion is glad to accept as its own, the inward yearning of the soul that turns away from all outward forms as empty and worthless, and is content with nothing short of the deepest inward union with God." Caird, Evolution of Religion, i. pp. 388, 389, ed. 1893.

- possessed only of a shadow of the good things to come<sup>1</sup> (Heb. x. 1).
- (β) Now we cannot believe that the vast organization of Judaism was instituted to be a preparation for nothing², that its complex mode of worship pointed on to no adequate fulfilment of what was typical and transitory. By denying the predictive import of the sacrifices of the Old Dispensation, we do but substitute a greater problem for a lesser and leave it still unsolved. "Judaism with a typified atonement may be a miracle or a chain of miracles, but Judaism without it is a greater miracle still³."

Thus "Expectation" is the inward spirit of the Old Testament, and the Scriptures thereof point onwards to One who is revealed in the New, and in both Testaments "everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, being both God and man."

1 "The iteration, the inefficacy, the transitoriness of the services of the Law which culminated in that of the Day of Atonement, followed from the fact that it 'had a shadow only of good things to come.' It could provide nothing more than symbolic, and therefore recurrent, offerings, which in different ways witnessed to an idea they were inadequate to fulfil." Bp Westcott on Heb. x. L.

ii. The testimony of the early Fathers.

The testimony of the early Fathers is quite plain. For example:—

- (a) Ignatius affirms that "the prophets preached the Gospel, hoping in Christ and waiting for Him<sup>1</sup>";
- (b) Justin Martyr says that "in the Books of the Prophets we find Jesus Christ foretold as born of a Virgin, healing diseases, crucified, dead, rising again, and ascending into heaven?"
- (c) Irenæus declares that "the Law began in the time of Moses, and ended with John the Baptist, when Christ came to fulfil it<sup>3</sup>";
- (d) Origen writes, "the same Providence, which heretofore gave the Law, afterwards gave the Gospel, not being willing to retain the rites and ceremonies of the Jews, but destroying their city and temple<sup>4</sup>";
- (e) Tertullian testifies that "the Church mingles the Law and the Prophets with the Evangelical and Apostolical writings, and thence drinks of faith<sup>5</sup>";
- (f) S. Augustine speaks of the Old Testament as "a Prophecy of the New, so that the holy Patriarchs and Prophets had the hope of eternal salvation therein."

- v. Proof of the second Statement that "the old Fathers did not look only for transitory promises." This may be shewn
  - (1) From the language of our Lord;
  - (2) From that of the Epistle to the Hebrews;
  - (3) From the words of the Old Testament itself.
  - (a) The language of our Lord:—

Besides constantly quoting the Old Testament Scriptures to establish truths of eternal import:

- (i) He expressly asserts respecting them These are they which bear witness of Me (John v. 39);
- (ii) He says to the Jews, If ye believed Moses, ye would believe on Me, for he wrote of Me<sup>2</sup> (John v. 46);
- (iii) He affirms respecting Abraham, Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day, and he saw it and was glad 3 (John viii. 56);
- (iv) After His Resurrection He spends an entire Easter afternoon in interpreting to the two on the road to Emmaus in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself (Luke xxiv. 27).

1 'Excîval = "they," "precisely they," the very Books of the Old Covenant, which the Jews so diligently studied, "testify of Me." "The scriptures witnessed of One whom the Jews rejected; they pointed to a life which the Jews would not seek. There is a deep pathos in the simple coordination: and,...and." Bp Westcott on John v. 30.

<sup>2</sup> El γάρ ἐπιστεύετε Μωυση, ἐπιστεύετε ἀν ἐμοl = If ye believed Moses (not if ye had believed), ye would believe Me. The tenses are imperfects not aorists. Si enim crederetis Moysi, crederetis forsitan et Mihi. Vulg. Disbelief in Moses involved disbelief in Christ. Westcott, in loc.

3 'Ηγαλλιάσατο, exulled, rejoiced with the joy of exultation in his eager desire, in his confident hope to see My day, and he saw it and was glad. When this was we cannot exactly say. "All conjecture," remarks Bp Westcott, "must be uncertain, but there is nothing unnatural in the supposition that the faith shewn in the offering up of Isaac may have been followed by some deeper, if transient, insight into the full meaning of the promises then renewed. Such faith was in itself, in one sense, a vision of the day of Messiah."

Thus Abraham and Moses, the representatives respectively of the Patriarchal and Legal Dispensations, are declared, the one to have "exulted" in anticipation of the coming of our Lord, and the other to have "written" of Him. This involves on their part not hope only in the transitory promises of this life, but implicit belief in the Divine Promise respecting the future, and thus S. Paul could justly tell Timothy that those Scriptures of the Old Testament, which he had known from a child, were able to make him wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus (2 Tim. iii. 15).

- (β) The language of the Epistle to the Hebrews:—
  The writer of this Epistle,
  - (a) After describing the faith of Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, says, These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them and greeted them from afar, and having confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things make it manifest that they are seeking after a country of their own. And if indeed they had been mindful of that country, from which they went out, they would have had opportunity to return. But now they desire a

1 "The three thoughts rise in natural succession. (a) They saw the promises in their actual fulfilment: (b) they welcomed the vision with joy though it was far off: (c) they confessed what must be the true end of God's counsel."

By Westcott on Heb. xi. 12.

Bp Westcott on Heb. xi. 13.

<sup>2</sup> Comp. Gen. xxiii. 4; xlvii. 9. The language of the patriarchs "shewed that they continued to the last to look for what they had not attained. As 'strangers' (¿٤νοι, comp. Eph. ii. 12), they acknowledged that they were in a foreign land; as 'sojourners'  $(\pi a \rho \epsilon \pi \hbar \delta \eta \mu o \iota$ , comp. I Pet. i. I; ii. II), that they had no permanent possession, no rights of citizenship. At the same time they kept their trust in God. Their natural fatherland had lost its hold upon them. They waited for a 'city' of God's preparing." Bp Westcott and Vaughan in loc.

better country, that is, a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed of them, to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city<sup>1</sup> (Heb. xi. 13—16);

- (β) Again he says that Moses accounted the reproach of Christ² greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he looked³ unto the recompense of reward (Heb. xi. 26);
- (γ) Once more, after speaking of the terrible sufferings of many of the saints of the Old Testament, he says that they were tortured, not accepting their deliverance: that they might obtain a better resurrection than the earthly life, which they might have retained by the acceptance of the offered deliverance (Heb. xi. 35).

Now they who "desire a better country, that is, a heavenly"; they who "despise the pleasures of sin and choose through life rather to suffer ill-treatment with the people of God"; they who "have their eye fixed on the recompense of reward"; they who "endure torture, not accepting the deliverance placed within their reach, that they may obtain a better resurrection," must certainly have looked for more than transitory promises, even for those of life and immortality.

<sup>2</sup> Τον δνειδιαμόν τοῦ Χριστοῦ (Heb. xi. 26) = the reproach of Christ. "This reproach, which was endured in the highest degree by Christ Jesus (Rom. xv. 3) was endured also by those who in any degree prefigured or represented Him, those, that is, in whom He partially manifested and manifests Himself, those who live in Him and in whom He lives." Bp Westcott in loc.

(γ) The witness of the Old Testament itself.

In the Old Testament we find eminent saints testifying again and again that they looked for more than transitory promises. Thus

(a) We find the patriarch Job<sup>1</sup>, when everything was against him, and he was the most miserable of all objects, saying,

I know that my Redeemer liveth,

And that He shall stand up at the last upon the earth;

And after my skin hath been thus destroyed, Yet from my flesh shall I see God:

Whom I shall see for myself,

And mine eyes shall behold, and not another<sup>2</sup> (Job xix. 25—27);

There are difficulties connected with this passage, but this much is clear that Job is convinced of the future adjustment of the contradictions of this life, and sees God Himself appearing as his God or Vindicator, and redeeming him from the unjust ban pressing heavily upon him;

(β) Again we find the patriarch Jacob not only sketching out the fortunes of his sons in the far-

1 "The Book of Job, whatever date be assigned to it, and whether its contents be regarded as history or parable, is throughout a very hymn of immortality. If this world were all, all was lost for Job; God was a terrible enigma; chance was God; Providence was but a name. But Job in the depth of his anguish knows that his Redeemer liveth, and that from his flesh he shall see God." Liddon's University Sermons, Series i. p. 113. "In Job we have," writes

Professor Mozley, "an instance of a gleam of a future life," "of truth breaking forth in a sudden inspiration before it settles into a doctrine." Lectures, p. 50.

2 "His God, or Vindicator, is living and not subject to death—and the satisfaction which God grants him is, that he will behold Him after death—the God who now hides Himself from him, and will not suffer him to approach Him."—Orelli's Old Testament Prophecy, p. 185.

off future, but predicting the coming of the Shiloh, unto whom should the obedience of the peoples be (Gen. xlix. 10);

- (γ) Joseph, again, when he too comes to die, does not concentrate his thoughts only on the present, but warns those around him that they were not to find an abiding home in Egypt, and he charges them to carry his bones into the land of promise (Gen. l. 24, 25)¹;
- $(\delta)$  David also in a well-known Psalm says

Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol; Neither wilt Thou suffer Thy holy one to see corruption (Ps. xvi. 10);

It is possible that the Psalmist, when he wrote the words, did not understand them in all the fulness of their meaning, yet so far as he himself is concerned, he clearly conceived that there was hope for him beyond the grave<sup>2</sup>;

(e) Once more Isaiah speaks of God as swallowing up death for ever, and wiping away tears from off all faces (Isai. xxv. 8), and still more clearly he says

Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust; For thy dew is as the dew of herbs<sup>3</sup>,

1 "The Faith of Joseph was national at once and personal. He looked forward to the independence of his kindred: and he claimed for himself a share in their future." Bp Westcott on Heb. xi. 22.

<sup>2</sup> "The doctrine of a future life is involved in the Psalmist's faith, though this truth could only be apprehended gradually and through long struggles. For ourselves the words must bear the fuller meaning with which Christ's resurrection has illuminated them. To us they must speak of that 'eternal life,' which is begun here, and is to be consummated hereafter." Prof. Kirkpatrick on Ps. xvi. 10.

<sup>3</sup> Or "the dew of light," or "the light." "The dew is God's fertilizing gift from heaven, eliciting the riches of the earth... Coming down from the light of heaven God's energy bedews the earth, so that the earth in consequence gives forth the shades, i.e.

And the earth shall cast forth the dead 1 (Isai. xxvi. 19).

These passages, and others too numerous to cite<sup>2</sup>, sufficiently prove that the old fathers, judging from their own language, looked beyond the present to a future and abiding reward, and an adjustment of present contradictions.

The Mosaic Law.

vi. The last clause of the Article affirms that the Moral Law of the Mosaic Covenant is binding upon all Christian men. It rightly regards the Jewish Law under a threefold division, (1) the Ceremonial Law; (2) the Civil Law; and (3) the Moral Law.

(a) The Ceremonial Law:-

This was a system of types and symbols preparatory for and pointing on to the coming of the Messiah, Who was to fulfil them all. This our Lord did. He fully satisfied every requirement of the Law, and, by His life of perfect obedience and His atoning death upon the Cross, became the Author of a new covenant between God and man, based upon the one all-sufficient sacrifice, and oblation. which He offered once for all for "the sins of the whole world," the adequacy of which He attested when from His Cross He exclaimed τετέλεσται, It is finished (John xix. 30). Now, therefore, that the great Antitype has come, the ancient typical sacrifices have vanished away (Heb. viii. 13)8.

the souls of the departed which it hides." Orelli's Old Testament Prophecy, p. 303.

See Rev. Version, Margin.

<sup>2</sup> Compare the words of Daniel, Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt (Dan. xii. 2).

3 Compare also Gal. v. 4, the argument of the whole of which Epistle is directed against the observance of the old Jewish Ceremonial Law.

(β) The Political or Civil Law:—

This was framed for the special circumstances of one particular nation, when Jehovah condescended to become the exclusive sovereign of the Jewish people. Under such immediate Divine Rule offences against religion became offences against the state<sup>1</sup>, and acts of treason which were punishable with death. But this cannot be the case now. Our Lord rules indeed in the Kingdom of Grace, but His decrees are enforced upon the will solely by the strivings of His indwelling Spirit in conscience. Hence the civil portion of the Mosaic Law is no longer binding and civil punishment cannot be inflicted for religious offences. Forgetfulness of this led the Brownists, the fathers of the Independents, and after them many of the Puritans, to hold that we "are tied unto all the judicials of Moses," and that idolaters, including "contemners of the Word and prayers," should be put to death according to the Mosaic Law.

(y) The Moral Law:-

This is of permanent obligation as being founded on the eternal principles of justice and truth. It is not a code of enactments, given for the temporary guidance of a single nation, but a principle of morality for the direction and guidance for all time of rational and accountable beings. The Moral Law, which is God's will<sup>3</sup> is like

Society. The Pilgrim Fathers enacted some portion of the Mosaic judicial law, and put it in force in their new American settlements with extreme severity.

<sup>3 &</sup>quot;The Divine Will bears no arbitrary relation to the Moral Law. God did not create absolute morality; it is coeternal with Himself"; "the shadow does not depend on the mere arbitrary will of the substance for its shape, but on the nature of the substance." See Mansel's Limits of Religious Thought,

Himself; His holy and perfect character is its expression. In the Sermon on the Mount Christ shows that God is on the side of the Moral Law, and that He is pledged ever to promote its fulfilment. Think not, He says, that I came to destroy the Law or the prophets; I came not to destroy, but to fulfil (Matt. v. 17), and He affirms, Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. v. 19). Moreover He illustrates His position in reference to the Moral Law by His comments on the Sixth and Seventh Commandments. Of the former He affirms that it forbids not only the murderous deed, but the angry word<sup>1</sup>, and of the latter that it forbids impurity not merely in act, but also in look and thought2. Thus so far from teaching that under the New Dispensation the Moral Law is done away, He shows that it is still more binding on the Christian than ever it was on the Jew, and that from obedience to it "no Christian man whatsoever is free3."

p. 146; Ward, The Catholic Revival, quoting J. H. Newman, p. 217. "The Moral Law is based upon Nature as God made it, Nature as the expression of an absolute and Eternal Goodness, the Living Parent of the Universe." Thus "Christus non tradidit Præcepta moralia Positiva, sed Naturalia illa magis explicavit"; and "in its ethical aspect Christianity does not offer a system of morality, but a universal principle of morality which springs out of the Resurrection." See Westcott's Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 7; Tertull. De Virg. Vel. § 1.

Matt. v. 27, 28. Thus our Lord proclaimed the proper essence of morality; goodness, He taught, is goodness of will, dependent not on any extrinsic effects, but upon the man's direction of himself to the realisation of a conceived or imagined belief. Cf. Green's Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 149.

3 "The standard of Mohammedanism, by contrast to Christianity, may be described as a standard deliberately adapted to the average moral level of the men to whom it was meant to appeal. 'If one had to express in a short compass,' says Professor Mozley, 'the character of its remarkable founder as a teacher, it would be that that great man had no faith in human nature...' 'Human nature is weak,' he said...The method of Christ is in striking opposition. He, before Mohammed, said 'The flesh is weak'; but from the startingpoint of this acknowledgment He proceeds by a quite different path. No book exhibits so profound a contempt for majorities, so startling a refusal to consider the conditions of success on the average, as the New Testament. Jesus Christ makes His appeal to the best." Gore's Bampton Lectures, pp. 206, 207, Ed. 1891.

by us committed to their spiritual charge, that they ought and must most constantly believe and defend all those things to be true, which be comprehended in the whole body and canon of the Bible, and also in the three Creeds or Symbols." Art. I. of the X. Articles of 1536.

to vindicate and re-affirm the truths of Christianity, as they were current in the purest days of the Faith1.

- iii. Analysis. The Article consists of two parts:-
  - (i) First it states that the three Creeds "ought thoroughly to be received and believed":
  - (ii) It states the ground for their reception to be, because "they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture."
- iv. The Order in which the Creeds are enumerated deserves attention. First we have the Nicene Creed, of which it is remarked in the Ten Articles of 1536 that "it is said daily in the Mass2." Then follows "Athanasius's Creed," which in the Sarum Breviary was appointed to be sung daily at Prime, after the Psalms and before the Prayers3. Last of all we have "that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed," "the common Creed," as it is termed in the Ten Articles, "which every man useth4."
- v. Origin of Creeds. The first preaching of the Gospel was not merely a preaching of love or of exalted morality, but of a series of supernatural facts, having refer-

The number of times appointed for the recitation of the "Quicunque Vult" was not altered till 1549. Then it was appointed to be used on the six Festivals of Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, and Trinity. In 1552 seven Saints' days were added to these six festivals; so that this Confession of our Christian Faith should be used at intervals of about a month throughout the year.

4 "For nearly three centuries and a half the Apostles' Creed has held its place in the Book of Common Prayer as the Creed of Baptism, of the Catechism, and of the daily offices. Even in the Middle Ages it was known to a relatively large number of the English laity through the instructions of the Clergy and the versions circulated in Primers. The English Reformers inherited a reverent esteem for the Credo, and gave it in their new Order of 1549 a place of honour equal to that which it held in the Breviary and the Manual." Prof. Swete, The Apostles' Creed in its Relation to Primitive Christianity, p. 9.

ence to the Person and Work of our Lord and Saviour. He Himself before His Ascension gave His Apostles a Formula, intended both for actual use and as a basis of instruction (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). This Formula became the model and suggested the outline of the ancient Creeds<sup>1</sup>, which in time became not only a source of definite instruction, but the Symbolum or Watchword, by which the true soldier of Christ was distinguished from those, who did not believe in Him. The Eastern and Western Churches, while they, each and all, made the Baptismal Formula, as taught by our Lord, the ground-work of the Creeds2, developed the Articles of their belief each in its own way and reflected therein the respective characteristics of Eastern and Western Christianity<sup>3</sup>.

vi. The Nicene Creed is not only the most ancient, but the only one of the three Symbols of doctrine, which, with the exception of a single clause4, is acknowledged alike by the Greek, the Latin, and the Anglican Churches, It meets with more or less acceptance from many other Christian bodies. The constant repetition of this Symbol in the Eucharistic Office arose in the Eastern Church as a safeguard against the Arian heresy, and from the East gradually passed into the Churches of the West. To this day it is professed in most countries of the civilized world, and so long as faith in the eternal Deity of Christ lives, it will be regarded with reverence and with gratitude5.

vii. The Quicunque vult, or "Confession of our Christian Faith, commonly called the Creed of S. Athanasius." is a composite treatise of unknown authorship. It consists in the main of two long dogmatic statements, one concerning the Holy Trinity, the other concerning the Incarnation, set in the framing of what are called "the damnatory clauses," which were probably added in the first flush of the Church's triumph over Arianism in Gaul and Spain about the beginning of the Ninth Century. Both sections were probably used at even a later date than this as separate treatises. There is nothing to suggest a translation from the Greek1. There is much, in particular in the section concerning the Trinity2, which reflects the teaching of S. Augustine<sup>3</sup>. The early titles, such as Hymnus Athanasii, Fides Athanasii, indicate it to have been not a Symbolum but a rhythmic exposition of Christian doctrine associated, as was natural when the Church was threatened by a militant Arianism, with the name of this great Eastern Father. Its use in the Roman Breviary on Sundays is distinctly not that of a Symbol, for it is additional to that of the Apostles' Creed. In some editions of the Greek Monologion it does not occur at all. Although, perhaps, originally intended for the Clergy, it has, when rightly used and intelligently explained4, a very high value as an instrument of teaching and of maintaining the Catholic Faith<sup>5</sup>.

extremity of the civilized world to the other, in the lonely hamlets of the Alps, in unknown isles of the ocean discovered by modern science, when the solemnity of the Sunday lifts towards heaven brows bent earthward by labour, is heard a concert of rustic voices repeating in one and the same tone this Hymn of the Divine Unity: I believe in one God the Father Almighty," etc. De Broglie, L'Église et TEmpire Romain au 4ième siècle, ii. p. 68, quoted by Bp Forbes On the Articles, pp. 136, 137.

1 No Greek copy of it is known to exist earlier than A.D. 1200, and it is nowhere found in the genuine writings of Athanasius or of his contemporaries.

2 Its doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Spirit would alone suffice to mark its Western origin.

4 See Procter's History of the Book

viii. Structure. Leaving out of account the framework, (a) the First Part, Verses 3—25, contains the Augustinian doctrine respecting the Blessed Trinity; (b) the Second, Verses 28—35, contains a summary of the doctrine regarding the nature of our Lord as laid down at the Council of Chalcedon, and guards the great verity of His Incarnation from the perversions of heresy. And the treatise then concludes with the simple repetition of Articles iv., v., vi., vii. of the Apostles' Creed nearly in the very words of the latter; it omits Articles ix. and x., there being no controversy with regard to the subjects they touch upon, while in Articles xi. and xii. it expresses itself in fuller and more precise language than we find used in the more familiar Creed.

ix. The Apostles' Creed, which is named last in the Article, was regularly repeated in the Middle Ages at Matins. Prime, and Compline. According to the Sarum Breviary it was said together with the Lord's Prayer privately by the Choir before the Lections at Matins, and inaudibly by the priest at the beginning of the Prayers at Prime and Compline<sup>1</sup>. It is the product of the Western Catholic Church within the first four centuries, but it is not till A.D. 750 that we find it in a shape entirely identical with our present formula. "The basis of this document, the local Creed of the early Church of Rome, is substantially a product of the second century. But the Churches which derived their faith from Rome, or acknowledged the primacy of the Roman See, felt themselves under no obligation to adhere to the letter of the Roman Creed: and it received at their hands not only verbal changes, but important additions, involving in some cases new Articles of belief. The process was gradual, and some of the new

- x. The term Symbolum Apostolorum or Apostolicum was originally "the designation not of one formulary, as distinguished from others, but of the Creeds generally. It implied that the doctrine set forth, though not necessarily couched in the very words delivered by the Apostles, was at least Apostolic doctrine, such as the Apostles taught, such as they handed on. But when distinctive names came to be given to particular Formularies, 'Symbolum Nicænum,' 'Symbolum Constantinopolitanum,' then the Western Formulary, which hitherto had had no distinctive name, retained the appellation which had once been common to all, and which thus became itself distinctive3." The idea that it received its name from the fact that, before they set forth on their several Missions, each one of the Apostles contributed to it an Article, rests on no authority. It received its name mainly owing to the causes just stated, and also, perhaps, because, as the Church of Rome was the only Church in the West certainly deemed to have been founded by an Apostle, and its See was called the Apostolic See, so its Creed was known as the Apostolic or Apostles' Creed 4.
- xi. Ground of reception of the Creeds. Of these Creeds the Article says they are "thoroughly to be received and believed: for they may be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture." Here we have another illustration of the profound reverence for the Bible, as the inspired Word of God and the sole authority for doctrine, which is so dominant a feature of the Articles. There is throughout a special jealousy for the authority of Holy Scripture, and here it is once more set forth as the one Rule of Faith. The Church of England does not claim acceptance for the Creeds simply on the ground that they have been handed down by the Church, but because they agree with the teaching of Holy Scripture1. Scripture and the Creeds thus stand in mutual relation to each other2. Those truths, which the Bible sets forth in the popular form of life and fact, the Creeds gather up in the logical form of doctrine. They mark out the great verities, which the Church believes the Scriptures to teach, and guard them against arbitrary interpretation by individuals or particular bodies of professed believers3. The Bible is thus regarded as the sole Source of the Rule of Faith; the Creeds witness to the Church's interpretation of the Bible; in them no doctrine is explicit, which is not first implicit in the Bible4.

p. 91. The source of error, says Pope Leo in his famous Tome, is that when men are "hindered by some obscurity in knowing the truth, they run not to Prophets, or Apostles, or Evangelists, but to themselves"; they will not "labour in the broad field of Holy Scripture." S. Leo, Ep. xxviii. I, 2.

1 "The Bible is the sole source of the faith: the Church is the interpreter. The Church is the primary teacher of the truth to her children, but she sends them to the Scriptures to verify it for themselves." Gore's Rom. Cath.

In other words the Church, as the interpreter of Scripture, can only interpret what is "read therein." "Jesus Christ, says the Gospel in every page, is the Son of God...... I ask of the Church's authority what is the sense of this word Son of God? And the Church answers me with a voice, which has always been the same for eighteen hundred years: that the expression has to be taken in its most absolute sense,... in the sense of a perfect filiation, which places the Son on an equality of wisdom, power, virtue, majesty and glory with God the Father." Didon, Belief in the Divinity of Jesus Christ, p. 69, E. T. ed. 1894.

3 "Dogma is not a substitute for truth, but a guide to its apprehension. To accept a dogma on the Church's external authority is only the first step to apprehending it for ourselves."

Gore's R. C. Claims, p. 68.

4 "The decisions of Nicæa simply express in a new form, without substantial addition, the Apostolic teaching as it is represented in the New Testament. They express it in a new form for protective purposes, as a legal enactment protects a moral principle. They are developments only in the sense that they represent the Apostolic teaching worked out into formulas by the aid of a terminology which was supplied by Greek dialectics... The Apostolic language is a mine from which, first taught and guided by the Creed of the Church, we can draw a continual and inexhaustible wealth of positive teaching." Gore's Bampton Lectures, pp. 96, 97, Ed. 1891.

GROUP III.

ARTICLES IX.—XVIII.

The Articles in this Group deal with men as individuals, and the Divine Plan for their salvation.

They treat of

- (a) The nature of Original Sin (Art. ix.), its effect on the human will, and the need of Divine Grace (Art. x.); the ground of man's Justification before God (Art. xi.), and the true value of Good Works, whether following (Art. xii.) or preceding Justification (Art. xiii.);
- (β) Works of Supererogation (Art. xiv.); the danger of ignoring the universal corruption of sin, which none has escaped save our Lord, "the Lamb without spot" (Art. xv.), Who came to take away the sin of the world, and can cleanse from all sin, even that committed after Baptism (Art. xvi.);
- (γ) The Scriptural Doctrine of Predestination, and its relation to the eternal purpose of God (Art. xvii.), Who wills to connect man's salvation not, in the way of Nature, with any law or sect a man professeth, but in the way of Grace with the all-meritorious sacrifice of His Blessed Son (Art. xviii.).

ARTICLE IX.

Peccatum Originale.

Peccatum originis non est (vt fabulantur Pelagiani) in imitatione Adami situm, sed est vitium et deprauatio naturæ cuiuslibet hominis ex Adamo naturaliter propagati, qua fit, vt ab originali iustitia quam longissime distet, ad malum sua natura propendeat, et caro semper aduersus spiritum concupiscat. Vnde in vnoquoque nascentium, iram Dei atque damnationem meretur. Manet etiam in renatis hæc naturæ deprauatio; qua fit, vt affectus carnis, græce φρόνημα σαρκός, (quod alij sapientiam, alij sensum, alij affectum, alij studium carnis interpretantur) legi Dei non subjiciatur. Et quanquam renatis et credentibus nulla propter Christum est condemnatio, peccati tamen in sese rationem habere concupiscentiam fatetur Apostolus.

Of originall or birth sinne.

Originall sinne standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vaynely talke) but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of enery man, that naturally is engendred of the ofspring of Adam, whereby man is very farre gone from originall ryghteousnes, and is of his owne nature enclined to euyll, so that the fleshe lusteth alwayes contrary to the spirite, and therefore in euery person borne into this worlde, it descrueth Gods wrath and damnation. this infection of nature doth remayne, yea in them that are regenerated, whereby the luste of the fleshe, called in Greke φρόνημα σαρκός, which some do expounde the wisdome, some sensualitie, some the affection, some the desyre of the fleshe, is not subject to the lawe of God. And although there is no condemnation for them that beleue and are baptized: yet the Apostle doth confesse that concupiscence and luste hath of it selfe the nature of synne.

- i. Connection. Having dealt with the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity and the Rule of the Faith, the Articles pass on to consider in the third group the practical aspects of the Christian Faith, especially as it relates to individuals, and the all-important subject of their salvation.
  - ii. Origin. The Ninth Article is derived from the Second Article of the Augsburg Confession of 1530, through the medium of the Thirteen Articles of 15381.

iii. Object. Its object is to oppose a form of misbelief, which troubled the Church in the Fifth, and was revived by the Anabaptists in the Sixteenth Century. That it refers to the teaching of the latter sectaries is clear from the original wording of the Article in 1553. For, after the words "as the Pelagians do vainly talk," the following addition was made, "which also the Anabaptists do nowadays renew."

iv. The Teaching of Pelagius. As regards the earlier of these forms of misbelief, Pelagius, an Irish<sup>2</sup> monk of the fifth century, together with Cœlestius, an ardent disciple, with whom he became acquainted at Rome, propagated the doctrine that

- (a) Adam was by nature mortal, and would have died in the course of time, even if he had not sinned<sup>3</sup>;
- (b) That every man is born pure, and falls from original righteousness as Adam did, by imitating the example which he set; and 375.

1 Hardwick, Hist. Articles, pp. 62

2 S. Jerome speaks of him as coming of the Scottish race (habet progeniem Scotica gentis de Britannorum vicinia), which may imply that he was an Irishman, the Scoti being at that time settled in Ireland. Smith's Dict. Biog. Article Pelagius. The principal dates connected with him are the following:—(1) Birth about A.D. 370; (2) arrival at Rome, where he meets Coelestius, A.D. 401; (3) withdraws, in consequence of Alaric's threatened invasion, to Sicily and Hippo in Northern Africa, A.D. 410; (4) present at the Synods of Jerusalem and Diospolis, A.D. 415; (5) condemned by Pope Zosimus in his

Epistola Tractoria, A.D. 418.

The Pelagians denied altogether the existence of original sin in any real sense as an hereditary moral corruption. They refuse to acknowledge the propagation of sin by generation (peccatum a traduce). Sin, they said, is not born with man, but is committed afterwards by man. One of the charges brought against Coelestius at a Synod held in Carthage A.D. 412 was that he taught "quod infantes qui nascuntur in eo statu sint, in quo fuit Adam ante transgressionem." S. Aug. de Peccato Orig. iii. 3. For a summary of Pelagian doctrine see Canon Bright's Waymarks in Church History, pp. 185—188.

- (c) That Adam did not transmit to his descendants, in consequence of his fall, any evil other than that of a bad example.
- v. Revived by the Anabaptists. These opinions, though strenuously opposed at the time by S. Augustine, and condemned at the Council of Carthage A.D. 418, and by the Council of Ephesus A.D. 431, were revived by the Anabaptists in the sixteenth century and pushed to great extremes.
- vi. Analysis. The Article, in language reflecting the controversies of its day,
  - (i) defines (a) what original sin is not, (b) what it is;
    - (a) What it is not:—

It does not consist in the mere imitation<sup>2</sup> of Adam, in doing the same as he did, as though he had been a copy or example<sup>3</sup>;

(b) What it is:—

"It is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the

1 Thus S. Augustine quotes Pelagius to the effect that "humano generi primum illud obfuisse peccatum non propagine, sed exemplo"; Pelagius's explanation of his view that infants are not born in sin being "quia isti præceptum capere nondum possunt...nondumque utuntur rationalis voluntatis arbitrio." De Peccato Orig. xv. 16.

<sup>2</sup> According to S. Augustine Pelagius affirmed "In Adam peccasse omnes, non propter peccatum nascendi origine contractum, sed propter imitationem." De Nat. et Grat. ix. 10. Sin, according to this theory, can only be an imitation of Adam's transgression, not a congenital deprayity of nature;

but if so, argues S. Augustine, why not regard Abel as "caput omnium justorum, quia primus in hominibus justus fuit"? ut supr.

3 Pelagius ignored the solidarité of the race for good or for evil. In Adam the race was created. In the creation of individuals subsequently the Divine Act has been conditioned by the possibility of sin involved in Adam's free-will. Accordingly, since the Fall the gift of Original Righteousness has been withheld. That God should be constrained by the sin of one man to do less than He would otherwise do for others is no unfamiliar thought.

offspring of Adam<sup>1</sup>," and the result of it is threefold:—

- (α) "Man is very far² gone from original righteousness";
- ( $\beta$ ) He is "of his own nature inclined to evil";
- (γ) "The flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit, and therefore in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and condemnation."
- (ii) Having thus laid down its definition of original sin, the Article next affirms that this "fault or corruption remains even in those that are regenerated, and though there is no condemnation to them that believe and are baptized, yet concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin."

vii. Original Righteousness. It is admitted on all sides that man, as he originally came forth from the Hands of God, was in body and soul more perfect than any men have been since. But the Churches differ as regards the nature of that primitive perfection. The Roman, Greek, and Reformed Churches all hold that it consisted not only (1) in a state of innocence and freedom from bodily death, but (2) in an habitual wisdom and holiness, with immortality of the body. Roman divines, following S. Augustine and others, distinguish these Dona as (I) Naturalia and (2) Supernaturalia1. The Eastern view is similar. Other Christians tend to ignore this distinction, which is really one of method, for both kinds of gift are created and both are primal2.

<sup>2</sup> Quam longissimė = very far, but not beyond possibility of recall. The Assembly of Divines in 1643 preferred the phrase "wholly deprived of original righteousness." Hardwick, Articles, p. 396. It is evident from Scripture that the image of God in man was not entirely obliterated by the Fall, comp. Gen. ix. 6, I Cor. xi. 7. While it is true that "experience shews us that by ourselves we cannot reach it," it is equally true that "we see with increasing clearness, when we contemplate our powers, our aspirations, our failures, an ideal, towards which we are made to strain." Bp Westcott, The Incarnation and Common Life, pp. 46, 47.

Man's Fall. But whatever was the nature of man's original condition, his fall is a matter of history, and involved not only himself, but all his progeny, so that men have ever since been born into the world without those prerogatives and endowments which the first human pair possessed before that event took place. The way, however, in which the sin of Adam wrought out its consequences upon mankind, is differently described. While the Catholic Church as a body never taught that the sin of Adam hurt himself alone and not his descendants.

- (i) The Greek and Roman Churches consider the effects of the Fall as being in the main privative, and as consisting in
  - The loss of the supernatural gifts of original holiness and immortality;
  - The enfeebling of the natural powers of man for good3;

non fuit naturalis ejus conditio, sed supernaturalis evectio." Bellarmine de Gratia primi hom. 2. Roman theologians distinguish three stages (1) Status Naturæ Puræ, a condition in which man lacks alike the empire of reason over his lower passions and the presence of Grace; (2) Status Natura

Integræ, in which there is added the empire of reason; (3) Status Naturæ Elevatæ, or Status Naturæ Protoparentum, in which there is added Grace. Righteousness, and destination for the Beatific Vision.

3 Of course it is not implied that this view in any way takes from the. heinousness of sin as sin, sin being essentially a matter not of results, but of "disobedience to a Will which I am meant to obey." Maurice, Epistles of S. 70hn, p. 47.

- (ii) The Article, fully admitting all this, proceeds to consider certain further and positive consequences of the Fall, and to insist that
  - (α) With the loss of original righteousness there ensued a corruption, more or less entire, of human nature in its spiritual aspect, inclining man to evil and disinclining him to good<sup>1</sup>, and
  - (β) That this transmitted taint, which he inherits, affects him deeply, causing an aversion from God of which he is, from time to time, sensible².
- ix. The Teaching of the Old Testament. To the existence of some profound source of disorder in man and the world around him the philosophers and poets alike of the ancient and modern world have borne abundant testimony<sup>3</sup>, and the witness of Scripture is no less clear and explicit.
  - (a) The earliest pages of Genesis tell the story of our primal human nature assailed by a supernatural being of unique subtilty and malignity, the enemy of God and of all goodness. Appealing first to Eve he began by insinuating a doubt as to that just retribution which she knew to belong essentially to the moral law, and then by suggesting the idea of an envious God sapped the foundations of all her trust, and roused an

- ardent longing for independence. So in an evil hour she took of the fruit and did eat; and she gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat (Gen. iii. 1-7);
- Brief and summary as is the information here given respecting the mystery of the Fall and the inroad of Sin2, it teaches the all-important truth :--
  - (α) That sin is not a substance or thing 3;
  - That it did not spring up in man's nature by any inevitable necessity, but came from without, and was the consequence of man's yielding to the seductions of a powerful and malignant foe4:
  - That he did not, like his Tempter, choose  $(\gamma)$ sin for its own sake<sup>5</sup>, but was beguiled into it:

1 "Evil is simply the disorder introduced into things by the perversity of creatures abusing their freewill and asserting, which is the essence of all sin—independence of God." Gore's Hints for the Study of Theology, p. 5.
"The one dark, insoluble mystery of human life is sin. It is so impossible for us to explain it; so futile to try and explain it away. It is so terribly familiar, so utterly unintelligible." Aubrey Moore, Aspects of Sin, p. 65.

4 "The current and tenour of Revelation is that Sin came from without. It had a history before it entered into the heart of man, -a history of which Holy Scripture contains a few mysterious fragments, but a history that can never be traced out by mortal man. save in its most shadowy outlines. How the first tendency to turn away from the Blessed Face of Almighty God ever originated in Angel or Archangel belongs to the secrets of Eternity. It did, however, originate, and sin had in another world its history." Bp Ellicott's Salutary Doctrine, pp. 64,65.

b "Satan, our Lord tells us, is not only a liar, but the father of it (John viii. 44). That is to say, all evil, as an actually existing fact, is to be traced to him. It was he who first gave historical birth to evil, by himself choosing to try it. When and how this was we are not told; we only know that from the beginning he was a murderer.... The seduction of man was one stage in his downward career. Having tasted evil himself. he persuaded mankind to do the same, not in the open and direct manner in which he himself had done so, but craftily and subtilly as the serpent form expresses." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, pp. 106, 108.

- (δ) That hence, though his being was poisoned with sin, it was not converted into sin, for he was conscious of transgression, and retained an ineradicable sense of shame<sup>1</sup>, which made him hide himself from the presence of God<sup>2</sup>.
- x. Further Witness of the Old Testament. But Scripture also teaches us that the fall of the first man did not merely affect himself. He was not a mere individual member of the species like ourselves. All humanity was gathered up in his one person. His fall was the fall of us all. He transmitted to his descendants the sinful tendencies to which he had made himself liable. His sin tainted the stock, and in the wickedness of Cain, who slew his brother (Gen. iv. 8; I John iii. 12); in the increasing depravity of the Cainite families (Gen. vi. I—7); in the violence and iniquity which rendered necessary
  - (a) The judgment of the Flood (Gen. vi. 11—13);
  - (b) Then that of the Confusion of Tongues (Gen. xi. 1—9);
  - (c) Then that of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix. 12—28);

we have proof that the corruption of man's nature increased

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The image of God is cruelly marred, but not utterly destroyed. The trace of God's likeness is yet visible to Him. When sin drove Adam and Eve from the garden, they were yet within the limits of God'slove. Their thoughts turned back to the Paradise they had lost, reached forward to the Promised Seed. This could not have been, if human nature had been ruined by the Fall. Absolute ruin must have been absolute separation from God, which is eternal death." Aubrey Moore, Some Aspects of Sin, p. 68.

&lt;sup>2</sup> "All true morality must rest on a certain limitation of the idea of the magnitude of the effect of original sin. If all the higher spiritual faculties be utterly destroyed, how can man really grieve over his shortcomings, if God has deprived him of all power of overcoming and avoiding these shortcomings?" in intensity as time went on, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually (Gen. vi. 5). What we find in these early portions of the Old Testament, we find also in the later. Thus the Psalmist says, Behold I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me (Ps. li. 5); Isaiah says, All we like sheep have gone astray; we have returned every one to his own way (Isai. liii. 6); and Jeremiah declares, The heart is deceitful above all things and it is desperately sick; who can know it? (Jer. xvii. 9, R.V.).

- xi. The Teaching of the New Testament. When we turn to the New Testament we find
  - (I) Our Lord affirms
    - (a) That none is good, save One, even God¹ (Mark x. 18, R.V.);
    - (b) That from within, out of the heart of men, evil thoughts proceed, fornications, thefts, murders, adulteries, covetings, wickednesses, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, railing, pride, foolishness<sup>2</sup> (Mark vii. 21, 22);

1 Otôlis ἀγαθός, εἰ μἡ εἶs, ὁ Θεός. According to S. Matthew xix. 17 our Lord leads the young man up to God, the Source of all good, from the question, "What good thing shall I do?" but according to S. Mark and S. Luke from the appeal, "Good Master." Both agree very well together. "Good Master, what good thing must I do?" runs the question; the answer is "How divided and isolated seems to thee what is good!" Jesus does not decline the appellation "good"; He repels it only in the superficial sense of the questioner. The young man deals with good in its relative meaning; and in this sense he says "Good," that is "Excellent" Master. "Jesus teaches him to apprehend good in its absoluteness; and to that end he must understand the being good, which he ascribes to Christ, as being founded in God." Lange in loc. "Deus est bonus: bonitas non est sine Deitate.... Jesus titulum Bonitatis sine titulo Deitatis ab illo non accipit: vindicatque honorem Patris sui, cum quo unum est." Bengel, on Mark x. 18.

(II) S. Paul states distinctly that

- (a) In Adam all die (I Cor. xv. 22);
- (b) Through one man sin¹ entered into the world, and death² through sin; and so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned (Rom. v. 12);
- (c) And as if specially to guard against the doctrine afterwards propounded by Pelagius, he adds, Death reigned from Adam until Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression<sup>3</sup> (Rom. v. 14).

Thus the teaching of Scripture clearly supports the statement of the Article that the sinful determination of the will on the part of our first parents necessarily involved a disturbance of the whole mode of human existence. Its teaching is not that the guilt of Adam's sin is imputed to his progeny, so that they deserved punishment for it though innocent of it themselves. The teaching of Scripture, as regards the doctrine of original sin, is in strict harmony with the modern scientific theory or doctrine of heredity. It is a matter of everyday experience that the sinful habits of parents are transmitted by them to their children, as certainly as other qualities and tendencies are passed on by inheritance. Human nature is bound up together, so that what one man does tells inevitably upon the lives of others1 not merely as setting a standard or presenting an ideal, but as entering into the very stuff of our common humanity, changing it for better or for worse?

- xii. The Teaching of the Early Fathers distinctly recognises the solidarity of the human race. Though the term Original Sin did not come prominently into use before the time of Pelagius and S. Augustine, we find the early Fathers speaking of the inherent taint in man's nature under such expressions as "the Old Transgression," "the Ancient Wound," "the Old Death." Thus
  - (a) Ignatius writes, "Christ gave Himself for us that He might cleanse us from the Old Transgression3":
  - Justin Martyr remarks that Christ was crucified "for mankind, who through Adam had fallen under death and the deception of the Serpent 4."
  - Irenæus writes that "men are no otherwise saved from the Ancient Wound of the Serpent, unless they believe in Him, Who according to the likeness of sinful flesh is exalted from the earth on the sions produce infinite results." Illing-

2 "The ethical basis of nature, which is not only in but born with the individual, is conditioned for each succeeding generation by the genera-tions going before. Individuals and races are organic points in the sum total of development, which has its starting point in the first Adam, and they by nature repeat the Adamic type. Every individual begins from his birth an abnormal development of life whose universal characteristic is the conflict between the flesh and the spirit." Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p. 174, E. - (d) Tertullian speaks of Satan as having "seduced man to violate the command of God, so that he therefore became subject to death, and the whole race, being infected by his sin, was rendered liable to condemnation?."
- (e) Cyprian maintains that "the remission of sins by Baptism ought not to be denied to an infant, who, newly born, has no part in sin, save that being descended from Adam according to the flesh, he has from his earliest birth contracted the contagion of the Old Death<sup>3</sup>."
- xiii. The Taint remaineth even in the regenerate. The Article next proceeds to state that this infection of nature remains even in those who are baptized and regenerate. For though the Sacrament of Baptism takes us out of our state by nature and places us in a "state of salvation," removing the guilt of original and actual sin, uniting us to Christ in His Mystical Body, in which the "invigorating and protecting force" of Covenant Grace is continually operative; yet it does not eradicate the natural tendency to sin.

Augustine remarks, "Regeneratus quippe non regenerat filios carnis, sed generat; ac per hoc in eos non quod regeneratus, sed quod generatus est, trajicit." De Peccato Orig. xl. Moreover, as he further says, "ipsa desideria vitiosa…in eodem lavacro Eaptismatis universo purgantur," i.e., concupiscence is removed reatu, but remains actu, and thenceforth, so far as the will does not consent, the motus concupiscentiæ are not present reatu but only actu.

xiv. Scripture Proof. And this accords with the teaching of Scripture. For

- (i) S. Paul could say of himself long after his Baptism,
  - (a) I buffet my body, and bring it into bondage; lest by any means, after that I have preached to others, I myself should be rejected (I Cor. ix. 27);
  - (b) I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing (Rom. vii. 18);
  - (c) The good which I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I practise (Rom. vii. 19)1.
- (ii) Again he exhorts his converts to follow his example as regards self-discipline: Thus
  - (a) He bids the Galatians walk by the Spirit, and, he adds, ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh (Gal. v. 16);
  - (b) He exhorts the Colossians to mortify their members which are upon the earth (Col. iii. 5);
- (iii) S. Peter, again, bids those who have long been grafted into the Church by Holy Baptism,
  - (a) To abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul (I Pet. ii. II);
  - (b) To be sober and watchful, and to resist the devil who as a roaring lion was ever walking about, seeking whom he might devour (I Pet. v. 8);
- (iv) And S. John, addressing well established Churches in Asia Minor, says,

- (a) If we say that we have no sin<sup>1</sup>, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us (I John i. 8);
- (b) If any man sin¹, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous² (I John ii. I).

These passages are sufficient to show that though the guilt of sin is removed in Baptism, yet conditions which constitute the tendency to sin remain even in them who are "regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church."

asserts that "although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized," yet the Apostle Paul, who tells us this, "doth confess, that concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin." He is aware within himself of subjective conditions which strongly predispose him to respond to external temptation, and the true affinity of which for sin is revealed to him by the restrictions of the Law (Rom. vii. 7 ff.)<sup>3</sup>. Again he says, Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey the lusts thereof (Rom. vi. 12), and S. James affirms that Lust, when it hath conceived beareth sin (Jas. i. 15)<sup>4</sup>. The traditional teaching

De Libero Arbitrio.

Of free wyll.

Ea est hominis post lapsum Adæ conditio, ut sese naturalibus suis viribus et bonis operibus ad fidem et invocationem Dei conuertere ac præparare non possit: Quare absque gratia Dei, quæ per Christum est, nos præueniente, ut velimus, et cooperante dum volumus, ad pietatis opera facienda, quæ Deo grata sint et accepta, nihil valemus. The condition of man after the fall of Adam is suche, that he can not turne and prepare hym selfe by his owne naturall strength and good workes, to fayth and calling vpon God: Wherefore we haue no power to do good workes pleasaunt and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christe preuentyng us, that we may haue a good wyll, and workyng with vs, when we haue that good wyll.

- i. Connection. The Tenth Article continues the subject treated of in the previous one, and deals with the results of the Fall as they affect the human will, and necessitate the help of Divine Grace.
- ii. The Title of the Article, "Of Freewill," hardly corresponds with the contents, for it does not directly assert the freewill of man at all, or define its powers, but deals with it rather by implication. It might be more truly entitled, "Of the Necessity of Divine Grace<sup>1</sup>," and it is drawn up almost exactly in the words of S. Augustine's Treatise, "Concerning Grace and Freewill."
- iii. History and Language. As it now stands, the Article is considerably longer than in the original draft of 1553. Then it began with what is now the Second Clause,

"We have no power to do good works," and lacked entirely the first Clause. This was added in 1563, and was derived in great measure from the "Confession of Würtemberg<sup>1</sup>," which was presented by the ambassadors of that State to the Council of Trent in 1552.

iv. Object. The Article is mainly directed against the doctrine of the Anabaptists, who revived in the Sixteenth Century the teaching of the older Pelagians, that the human will was possessed of such force and power, that without any special grace of Christ man could live a life acceptable unto God<sup>2</sup>.

v. Analysis. The Article consists of three parts:

- (i) It asserts as one of the results of the Fall that man's will has been so crippled that he cannot turn or "prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God";
- (ii) It states that the Grace of God is absolutely necessary to enable him to do this;
- (iii) It explains that this Grace acts in two ways;
  (a) It is a Preventing Grace (Gratia præveniens) going before us and giving us a good will; (b) It is a Cooperating Grace (Gratia cooperans) working in us and with us when we have that good will.

vi. Man's Freewill. The whole of man's responsibility

omitted a class of very discouraging facts,—the inclination to self-will, which, explain it as we may, is observable 'from the moment of dawning reason,' and the limitations which do not destroy the reality of freewill, but clog its action, and hem it in with the meshes of habit." Dr Bright's Waymarks in Church History, p. 192.

"Similiter nobis contra illos progrediendum est, qui tantum in libero arbitrio roboris et nervorum ponunt, ut eo solo sine ulla speciali Christi gratia recte ab hominibus vivi posse constituant." "Pelagianism, in its reckoning up of human possibilities, rests upon the freedom of his will. "If there is no freedom, there can be no virtue nor vice, no merit nor fault, no moral government of the universe1." How indeed God knows all things and orders all things, and yet leaves man's will free is a question which has occupied the ablest intellects<sup>2</sup>. The solution of the problem lies deep down in the fact of God's free self-limitation. By the creation of beings possessing liberty of choice God imposes upon Himself conditions which it is of His very fidelity as a Moral Ruler to respect. We may say that it was at no time possible for the human will to determinate itself in right choice without the help of God. We may also say that at no time was it left without Divine aid sufficient for such a purpose. It is not unreasonable to believe that the wrong choice of our First Parents, by the force of heredity, so influenced their descendants that the human will, without losing its liberty of choice, stood in yet greater need of Divine aid in order to choose aright?.

vii. Grace. The word which expresses this provision for human needs is Grace. The Xápis of the New Testament, it brings with it all the fair associations of the Latin Gratia. Denoting in its simple meaning (1) a favour, it becomes (2) the unmerited favour of God towards more it is in various degrees positively bent in a direction from God. The mind of the flesh is enmity against God (Rom. viii. 7), it does not submit to God's Law. The help man needs must come from without and from above. God alone can undo that which by his Fall man has inflicted on creation and on himself. The great Message of the Gospel is that God is not only able so to do, but willing also; and that He has, in fact, done it in the Person of His Son Incarnate." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, p. 121.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;The question of the relations between the liberty of man and the Divine power, of the influence of God upon the moral activity of men, is not peculiar either to the fifth century or to Christianity, but is a universal problem, which all religions, all systems of philosophy, have propounded to themselves, and have endeavoured to solve." Guizot's History of Civilisation in France. 2 "Man's will is not only sprained and weakened, not only so much enfeebled that it cannot set itself persistently to recover its strength, but humanity at large as displayed in the Incarnation of His Son; then (3) the operation of the same unmerited favour in its application to individual souls. In reference to the present subject it may be defined to be the strengthening power<sup>1</sup> freely bestowed upon us by God the Father for the sake of Jesus Christ His Son and wrought in us by the Holy Ghost, to enable us to know and do the will of God<sup>2</sup>.

viii. Prevenient Grace. The Grace of God, then, corrects the natural bias of the will in fallen man towards evil. It attracts, persuades, and aids the will to a right choice. The very first movement of the will towards what is good comes from God, and is known in theological language as Prevenient or Antecedent Grace. Thus it is a supernatural motion of the soul to will what is good and to refuse what is evil. Hence our Lord says, No man can come to Me, except the Father which sent Me draws him (John vi. 44), and again, Apart from Me ye can do nothing (John xv. 5). Hence also S. Paul writing to the Ephesians says, By grace have ye been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God (Eph. ii. 8); and to

1 "The Gratia gratum faciens is that inward help, freely bestowed, which God for the merits of Christ grants to fallen man, both to help his infirmity in the way of abstaining from that which is evil and doing that which is good." Bp Forbes On the Articles, p. 157. "Grace is not simply kindly feeling on the part of God, but a positive boon conferred on man. Grace is real and active force; it is, as the Apostle says, 'the power that worketh in us' (Eph. iii. 20), illuminating the intellect, warming the heart, strengthening the will of redeemed humanity." Liddon's University Sermons, First Series, p. 44.

<sup>2</sup> "Grace is power. That power whereby God works in nature is called force. That power whereby He works on the wills of His reasonable creatures is called Grace." Mozley On Predestination, p. 302. The potency of Grace as contrasted with the impotence of Law is a marked conception of S. Paul's. With him Grace is an invigorating and protecting force. Cf. Rom. vi. 14; viii. 3. Grace is "the vital force of the Body of Christ." Liddon on Rom. xii. 6.

3 Έλκύση. Έλκύεω differs from σύρεω. Σύρεω implies force, and = to drag (see Acts viii. 3; xiv. 19; xvii. 6). Έλκύεω implies an attraction of some kind, and inducement to come. Comp. Jer. xxxviii. 3, LXX. "With loving kindness have I drawn thee," εἶλκωσά σε; John xii. 32, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Myself," ἐλκύσω πρὸς ἐμαυτόν.

the Philippians he writes, It is God which worketh in you both to will and to work, for His good pleasure (Phil. ii. 13). Thus the Grace of God prevents, or goes before, us, that we may have a good will.

ix. Cooperating Grace. But the Grace of God is needed not only that we may desire what is right, but also that we may do it when we desire it. Hence we need Cooperating or Assisting Grace, whereby God "cooperates with us to will and to do that to which He had previously stirred us up." So our Lord, who says, Apart from Me1 ve can do nothing, also says, As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself2, except it abide in the vine, so neither can ve, except ve abide in Me (John xv. 4, 5). Having united our humanity in an indissoluble union with His own Divine Nature, He has become to it a life-giving spirit (I Cor. xv. 45). He is the Fount and Source of that holy inspiration, whereby man not only thinks those things that are good, but is mercifully enabled to perform the same3. His Grace, however, never constrains or forces the will; it never supersedes man's self-determination. On our part there is much to do. Hence the same Apostle, who tells the Philippians, It is God which worketh in you both to will and to work, bids them on their part work out their own salvation with fear and trembling<sup>1</sup> (Phil. ii. 12), and he exhorts the Corinthians to beware that they receive not the grace of God in vain (2 Cor. vi. 1).

- x. The Early Fathers teach the same doctrine. Thus
  - (a) Irenæus writes, "No man, who does not partake of the blessing and assistance of the Lord, can procure for himself the means of salvation2";
  - (b) Tertullian writes, "In order to imitate the pattern, which Christ has left us, we have need of the Grace of God3";
  - (c) Clement of Alexandria writes, "While a man strives and labours of himself to subdue his vicious affections, he can do nothing; but if he manifests an earnest and vehement desire to do so, he is enabled by the Divine Power to accomplish his purpose; for God favours and cooperates with the willing mind4";
  - (d) Once more, S. Augustine says, "If without God we can do nothing, certainly we can neither begin His work nor bring it to an end. For of the beginning it is said, 'His mercy shall go before me'; and of the end it is said, 'His mercy shall follow me all the days of my life's."

xi. The Teaching of the Prayer Book. With the teaching of the Fathers we may compare that of the Prayer Book. Twice a day, at Matins and Evensong, we pray, "O God make clean our hearts within us." and "Take not Thy holy Spirit from us." Again in the familiar Collect at the close of the Communion Service we pray, "Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings, with Thy most gracious favour, and further us with Thy continual help." So also in the Collect for Easter Day we ask of God that, "as by His special grace preventing us He puts into our minds good desires, so by His continual help we may bring the same to good effect." Again in the Collect for the Ninth Sunday after Trinity we pray, "Grant to us, Lord, we beseech Thee, the spirit to think and do always such things as be rightful; that we, who cannot do anything that is good without Thee1, may by Thee be enabled to live according to Thy will." Lastly in the Collect for the Seventeenth Sunday after Trinity we say, "Lord, we pray Thee, that Thy grace may always prevent and follow us. and make us continually to be given to all good works?"

xii. Conclusion. These passages from the Prayer Book conspire with the teaching of Scripture and the Primitive Fathers, and bear witness to the need on man's part of Prevenient Grace that he may have a good will, and of Cooperating Grace when he has that good will. For the will is not blinded but enlightened by Grace, and the whole man is enabled to act with the liberty of the glory of the children of God (Rom. viii. 21). Grace does not enslave the will, but enfranchises it3.

ARTICLE XI.

De Hominis Iustificatione.

Tantum propter meritum Domini ac Seruatoris nostri Iesu Christi, per fidem, non propter opera et merita nostra, iusti coram Deo reputamur: Quare sola fide nos iustificari, doc-nostra, iusti coram Deo reputamur: Quare sola fide nos iustificari, doctrina est saluberrima, ac consolationis plenissima: ut in Homilia de Iustificatione hominis fusibis explicatur. 1571.

Of the instification of man.

We are accompted righteous before God, only for the merite of our Lord and sauiour Jesus Christe, by faith, and not for our owne workes or descruynges. Wherefore, that we are iustified by fayth onely, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the Homilie of justification.

- i. Connection. The Eleventh Article relates to a question, which the preceding one naturally suggests. If the human will, in consequence of the fault and corruption of man's nature, is so crippled that he cannot of his own strength do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, how is he accounted righteous in His sight, and on what grounds is he regarded by God with any degree of favour?
- ii. Source and History. This question the present Article answers, and it is itself derived from the Fourth Article of the Augsburg Confession of 1530<sup>2</sup>. As it stood in the original draft, it consisted of a single clause, and asserted that "Justification by onely faith in Jesus Christ" is "a most certaine and holesome doctrine for Christian language of the Fourth of the Thirteen Articles of 1538. Both affirm that men are accepted by God "gratis propter Christum per fidem."

menne". A new clause, now the first, was added in 1563, and was adopted from the corresponding Article of the Würtemberg Confession.

iii. The Object of the Article is to proclaim the great truth, vital to our Christian Faith, that the Grace of God is the sole source of all merit; a truth which, both within and without the Church, had come to lose much of its value in the popular estimation. Thus the Anabaptists boasted themselves "to be righteous and to please God, not purely and absolutely for Christ's sake, but for their own mortification of themselves, for their own good works and persecution, if they suffer any?"

iv. Analysis. In its present shape the Article states (1) Positively, and (2) Negatively the grounds of our Justification before God.

- (I) We are justified only for the merits<sup>3</sup> of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;
- (2) We are not justified before God for our own works or deservings;
- (3) And this "is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort."

v. Justification. The word "Justification" can never properly lose its original meaning, a making righteous. The Latin "Justifico" means, it is true, when used of a judge to absolve or acquit1; but the forensic sense has its limitations. The substantive "justificatio," which may thus denote a justifying, pardoning3, includes, when applied to beings tainted, as we are, with sin (1) forgiveness4, (2) reconciliation to God, and (3) renovation, or making righteous.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;In that sense," it continues, "as is declared in the Homilie of Justification." There is no Homily entitled "the Homily of Justification." But "the Homily of Salvation" treats expressly of Justification, and it has, therefore, always been understood, either that this Homily alone, or this conjoined with that which precedes, and that which follows it, is the Homily referred to in the Article. See Bp Browne, p. 291.

<sup>3</sup> The Latin here is very noticeable. It is not said that we are accounted righteous "propter fidem," but "propter menitum...Christi per fidem." So in the Greek of the New Testament we are said to be justified πίστει Rom. iii. 28, ἐκ πίστεωs Rom. v. 1, Gal. ii. 16; iii. 8, 24, διὰ πίστεωs Rom. iii. 22; Gal. ii. 16; Ephes. iii. 12, but never διὰ πίστιν.

vi. The Moving Cause of our Justification. Now it is obvious that the original or moving cause of our Justification cannot be anything in ourselves. Man cannot forgive sins, or reconcile himself to God, or renew his moral nature. Sin taints his best and purest actions, and in the sight of a God of perfect holiness by the works of law shall no flesh be justified (Rom. iii. 20)5. Justification must be due simply and solely to the free and undeserved Grace and goodness of God. It is God that justifieth (Rom. viii. 33)6.

2 "Hæc est magnificentia Domini, justificatio peccatoris." S. Ambros.

Enarr. in Psalm. cx. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Similarly in Greek Δικαίωσις denotes the establishment of man as just by acquittal from guilt. Thus in Rom. iv. 25 we read ἡγέρθη διὰ τὴν δικαίωσιν ἡμῶν, and the verb δικαιοῦν, which literally means to make righteous, is used both in the LXX. and the N.T. with the meaning to acquit, absolve, or clear from guilt; comp. Gen. xliv. 16; Exd. xxiii. 7; Ps. cxliii. 2; Acts xiii. 39. It is important to note that Justification by Faith is not the Scripture phrase, but Justification by Faith in Fesus Christ, i.e. Justification by Faith and Grace.

4 "Remissio peccatorum est justificatio," S. Thom. Aquin. Quast. Disput. xxviii. Art. i.: "Justificatio significat remissionem peccatorum, et reconciliationem seu acceptionem ad vitam æternam," Melancthon De Grat. et Justif. Loci Theologici; "Justification signifieth remission of our sins, and our acceptance or reconciliation into the grace and favour of God," Articles of 1536. See also the Homily of the Salvation of Mankind.

"By whose merits shall I be delivered? Not by my own, O Lord; but in Thy righteousness deliver me. In Thy righteousness, I say, not mine. For I implore mercy; I do not offer my own righteousness...Thy grace is Thy righteousness, O Lord. And grace could not be grace if it were given for deserts; therefore, not in my own righteousness, but in Thy righteousness deliver me from my sins." Savonarola, Sorrow and Hope,

 7—9, ἔγνων ὅτι οὐ μὰ αἰσχυνθῶ· ὅτι 7—9, εγνων στι δυ μη αισχωνων στι δι μη αισχων στι δι μη vii. The Meritorious Cause of our Justification. But while the love of God is the moving cause, the meritorious cause of our justification is the finished work of Christ. It is His merits, and His merits only, which have purchased for us this great boon. Living for us a life of perfect obedience, and dying for us on the Altar of His Cross, He has procured for us the forgiveness of our sins. Thus S. Paul writing to the Romans says that we are justified freely by the grace of God through the redemption that is in Christ Fesus (Rom. iii. 24)2; and S. Peter writes Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that He might bring us to God3 (I Pet. iii. 18); and S. John writes Herein is love4, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins (I John iv. 10).

viii. The Efficient Cause. Though, objectively, the mercy of God is infinite, and the merits of Christ are sufficient, yet, in order that men may subjectively correspond thereto, and thus enter upon the life of Justification, something more is needed, namely, the work of the Holy Ghost within the soul<sup>5</sup> (Rom. viii. 14). It is His potent operation,

The source of merit is the perfect obedience of the Human Will of the Divine Person; any act of such an obedience is of infinite merit, yet, seeing that Redemption was wrought under the conditions of human history, the obedience finds its ultimate expression in the Cross and Passion. Comp. Phil. ii. 8; Heb. x. 5—10.

4 "The source of love is the free-

"The source of love is the freewill of God Himself. He loved us, because 'He is love,' and in virtue of that love sent His Son. The origin of love lies beyond humanity." Westcott in loc.

<sup>5</sup> "The Holy Spirit realises and completes the redemption which Christ has wrought in essence and Christ has wrought in essence and virtue. God the Son atoned; God which leads to Christ, moves the heart, and endows us with the ability "to will and to work of God's good pleasure."

- ix. The Instrumental Cause. The sole instrument, by which God conveys Justification is Grace, which determines itself in different forms. First, in Baptism<sup>1</sup> He "doth work invisibly in us," and translates us from a state of nature into a state of Grace. The life of Justification thus begun is maintained by the Sacraments of the Church<sup>2</sup> and by prayer. We may not, however, conclude that no degree of Justification is possible except through the instrumentality of the Sacraments of the New Covenant. Under whatever conditions the soul of man corresponds with the inward strivings of the Holy Ghost, there follow forgiveness, reconciliation and moral renovation. Certainly God is pledged to His own appointed means of Grace, but He is not restricted to them.
- x. Faith. What, then, is the office of Faith in Justification? It is the hand which grasps and appropriates the righteousness wrought out for us by Christ3. By faith the the Holy Ghost justifies." Newman, On Justification, pp. 204, 206.

1 It was Christ who merited that the Sacraments should have the power of uniting us to Him. Of His great mercy He has freely appointed these remedies for us, who could in no wise obtain them of ourselves. See Hooker Eccl. Pol. v. chap. lvii. 2-4.

Compare the words of the Church Catechism, "the strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the Body and Blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the Bread and Wine." "This then is one of the first elements of Christian knowledge and a Christian spirit, to refer all that is good in us, all that we have of spiritual life and righteousness to Christ our Saviour; to believe that He works in us, or to put the same thing more pointedly, to believe that saving truth, life, light, and holiness are not of us, though they must be in us." Newman's Parochial and Parish Sermons, v. p. 132.

3 In accordance with the above statements we may thus tabulate the Causæ Fustificationis Nostræ:

- i. Causa Movens: The free, unmerited, mercy of God.
   ii. Causa Meritoria: {(a) The Life of perfect obedience, and (β) The Passion of our Blessed Lord.
- Causa Efficiens: The Holy Spirit.
- iv. Causa Instrumentalis: Grace in

The Sacraments of the Church; (a) (β) Prayer, in all its manifold forms, both within and without the Covenant.

Christian puts himself simply and loyally in God's hands, and appropriates to Himself the Redemption, which the Precious Blood of His dear Son has purchased for the world. And as the faith of Abraham was reckoned to him for righteousness¹ (Rom. iv. 3), so the faith of the humblest of men is, in the eyes of God Whose gift it is, the very righteousness of Christ, imparted to him by Grace and as truly his own as the unrighteousness which it replaces².

xi. The Life of Faith. Faith, moreover, teaches us to employ diligently all the means provided by Him, in Whom we believe. Faith brought us in infancy to Baptism, and by Baptism we were engrafted into Christ's Church, and made partakers of His righteousness. Faith teaches us by prayer to plead the promise of the forgiveness of our sins then signed and sealed to us. Faith bids us claim the assistance of the Holy Spirit promised to every baptized Christian. Faith leads us to the reception of the Holy Eucharist, wherein we feed on Christ the living Bread<sup>3</sup>

v. Causa Recipiens: Faith (which (a) appropriates Christ's perfect obedience,

1 Έλογίσθη αὐτῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην, Gen. xv. 6, LXX. = His faith was reckoned unto him (put down in the account for counted as) righteousness. Cp. Gal. iii. 6; Jas. ii. 23. In the Hebrew the active is used, And He (God) counted it to him for righteousness. The will of the patriarch corresponding freely with the Divine Will had the value of a true righteousness; and God, in His perfect justice regarded it as such; however little at the moment Abraham actually did, the surrendered will was the beginning of a sanctified life. ᾿Αρίθμησον τὰς ἀστέρας...οῦτως ἔσται τὸ σπέρια σου καὶ ἐπίστευσεν Ἁβραὰμ τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ els δικαιοσύνην. God, in His infinite love and hope for us, estimates us, not as we already are, but as we are on the way to become. "He sees faith at a point higher and deeper than any act; the simple taking Him at His word, and being fully persuaded that what He has promised, He is able to perform." Vaughan on Rom. iv. 3.

<sup>2</sup> Remission of sins is Grace, "because it is God's own free gift; faith which qualifies our minds to receive it, is also grace, because it is an effect of His gracious Spirit in us; we are therefore justified by faith without works, by grace without merit." Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. Append. i. 16.

3 'O ἄρτος ὁ ζῶν, John vi. 48. Living Bread, having life in itself, which life is imparted to those who partake.

(John vi. 51). Again faith it is that prompts us to charity and all good works. Thus faith is the living bond of union betwixt Christ and the soul, and God looks upon us not as we are seen in ourselves1, but as we are seen in Christ, who, by virtue of the completeness of the union effected by His Incarnation, brings it about that "all that is ours becomes His, and all that is His becomes ours-even that perfect righteousness, which swallowed up and expiated our sin2"

xii. Patristic teaching. The statements of the early Fathers respecting Justification are rather practical than formal. What they do say, however, is explicit enough. Thus:

- (a) Clement of Rome writing to the Corinthians says, "We, having been called through His will in Christ Jesus, are not justified through ourselves or through our own wisdom or understanding or piety or works which we wrought in holiness of heart, but through faith, whereby the Almighty God justified all men that have been from the beginning; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen<sup>8</sup>;"
- S. Polycarp writing to the Philippians says, "Let us, therefore, without ceasing hold fast by our hope and by the earnest of our righteousness. which is Jesus Christ who took up our sins in His own body upon the tree, Who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth (I Pet. ii. 22, 24), but for our sakes He endured all things, that we might live in Him1;"

- S. Barnabas writes, "To this end the Lord endured to deliver His flesh unto corruption, that by the remission of sins we might be cleansed, which cleansing is through the Blood of His sprinkling2;"
- (d) Irenæus says, "All men fall short of the glory of God, and are justified not by themselves, but by the coming of the Lord3;"
- S. Ambrose says, "I will not glory, because I am (e) righteous, but because I am redeemed. I will glory, not because I am free from sins, but because my sins are forgiven me; not because I have profited, nor because any one hath profited me, but because Christ is my Advocate with the Father, and because Christ's Blood hath been shed for me4."

xiii. The Conclusion of the Article would lay itself open to the charge of Solifidianism were we not allowed to interpret it in the light of the Homilies, and of the Article "Of Good Works" immediately following. "That we are justified by faith only" is declared to be "a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort." It is a "most of good works, or, at least, of the purpose of doing well. "This sentence, that we be justified by faith only, is not so meant, that the said justifying faith is alone in man, without true repentance, hope, charity, dread, and the fear of God, at any time and season." Homily of Salvation.

wholesome" doctrine, because it reminds us of our true condition, as we are in ourselves apart from the Grace of God, and thus it checks spiritual pride, and corrects any tendency to self-righteousness. It is "very full of comfort," because it assures those, who are conscious how imperfect are their best efforts after holiness, that He, Who "despises not the sighing of a contrite heart," will for Christ's sake and His all-sufficient merits accept their imperfect endeavours and unite them to Christ's all-perfect obedience. The doctrine of Justification by Faith recognises man's absolute need of Divine Grace in every stage of His progress in the Christian life. It renders high praise to God the Father, from Whom cometh every perfect gift, as the moving cause of our reconciliation and forgiveness; it glorifies the Son as the sole meritorious cause1; it honours the Holy Ghost, as the sole efficient cause, through whose potent operation alone we are enabled "to will and to work of God's good pleasure?."

1 See Bp Forbes On the Articles,

р. 186. <sup>2</sup> The reason why faith has a certain stress laid upon it over and above the other parts of a religious character in our justification is "because the Gospel being preeminently a covenant of grace, faith is so far of more excellence than other virtues, because it confesses this beyond all others. Works of obedience witness to God's just claims upon us, not to His mercy: but faith comes empty-handed, hides even its own worth, and does but point at that precious scheme of redemption which God's love has devised for sinners. Hence it is the frame of mind especially suitable to us, and is said in a special way to justify us, because it glorifies God, witnessing that He accepts those and those only, who confess they are not worthy to be accepted." Newman's Parochial Sermons, Vol. iii. p. 87. "The doctrine of justification by faith is implied in the old custom of the Roman Church, clearly symbolical, of holding a crucifix before the dying. For what else could this custom mean, except that the man now in the solemn hour of death must rely, not upon his own merits, not upon the merits of the saints, but solely upon the Crucified Christ, as the only Mediator? The crucifix it was that Pius VII. pressed to his breast in his dying moments, while with strong words he refused the name 'most holy Father,' which some one addressed to him. 'What,' he exclaimed, 'most holy Father! I am a poor sinner.'" Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, E. T. P. 394.

ARTICLE XII.

De bonis Operibus.

Bona opera quæ sunt fructus fidei et iustificatos sequuntur, quanquam peccata nostra expiari et diuini iudicij seneritatem ferre non possunt, Deo tamen grata sunt et accepta in Christo, atque ex uera et uiua fide necessario profluunt, ut plane ex illis, æque fides uiua cognosci possit, atque arbor ex

Of good workes.

Albeit that good workes, which are the fruites of fayth, and folowe after iustification, can not put away our sinnes, and endure the seueritie of Gods iudgement: yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christe, and do spring out necessarily of a true and liuely fayth, in so muche that by them, a lyuely fayth may be as euidently knowen, as a tree discerned by the fruit.

- i. Connection. But if we are justified by faith only, the question arises, Does not this do away with, or at least disparage, the necessity of good works? It was to answer this objection and to clear up the language of the last Article, that the present one was introduced in 1563.
- ii. History and Object. The present Article, then, was entirely lacking in the original draft of 1553, and was drawn up by Archbishop Parker to a certain extent from the Würtemberg Confession<sup>1</sup>, to meet any charge that might be made against the Articles that they favoured the opinions of the Antinomians. These sectaries, in conjunction with the Solifidians, caused great trouble in the reign of Elizabeth, as is testified by Parker's own language<sup>2</sup>, and they had probably learnt their peculiar tenets abroad. They taught that faith and faith only, quite independently of good works, was sufficient for salvation.

I thought ministers should have needed to fight in unity of doctrine." Letter of Parker, March 1, 1558—9.

- iii. Analysis. In opposition to these doctrines the Article asserts three points:
  - (I) That good works are "the fruits of Faith;"
  - (2) That they "follow after Justification," or more literally, "them that are justified2;"
  - (3) That though they "cannot put away our sins and endure the severity of God's Judgement<sup>8</sup>; yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring necessarily of a true and lively<sup>4</sup> Faith; insomuch that by them a lively Faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit."
- iv. Good Works the fruits of Faith. Our Lord repeatedly demanded of men that their moral conduct<sup>5</sup> shall be the test of true discipleship. Thus:
  - (a) In the Sermon on the Mount He requires of His followers not merely good works generally, but

One of Luther's disciples, John Agricola, openly taught Antinomianism at Würtemberg, A.D. 1538, and though the doctrine was disclaimed by Luther, it tinged not a little the teaching of Munzer and John of Leyden.

The Latin expression "justificatos sequuntur" occurs in S. Augustine, "Sequuntur enim bona opera justificatum, non præcedunt justificandum."

This expression occurs in the Würtemberg Confession, "Omnia enim bona opera, quæ nos facimus, sunt imperfecta, nec possunt severitatem divini judicii ferre."

4 The word "lively" in the English translation of the Article means "living," "full of life," "vigorous." Comp. Ps. xxxviii. 19, "mine enemies are lively"; Acts vii. 38, A.V., "who received the lively oracles to give unto us"; I Pet. ii. 3, A.V., "a lively hope"; I Pet. ii. 5, A.V., "lively stones."

5 "In His Miracles of mercy, faith

o" In His Miracles of mercy, faith was the condition our Lord exacted for the exertion of His powers of healing and restoration. On one occasion He says, "All things are possible to Him that believeth" (Mark ix. 23). Yet afterwards in His solemn account of the last judgment, He tells us it is obedience to His will which will then receive His blessing." Newman's Parochial Sermons, iii. p. 84.

- the obedience of the heart as well as of the hands, and eye, and tongue (Matt. v. 15-48);
- Again He said to His Apostles, Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; and so shall ve be My disciples (John xv. 8);
- Moreover in His last solemn discourse on the Mount of Olives He makes charity and the exercise of the corporal works of mercy, the very condition of His approval at the judgment of the last day (Matt. xxv. 31-46).

Thus He makes it clear that as faith is the inward reality of the spiritual life, so good works are its outward reality and its evidential expression. Faith is the root of good works, and where it is vital cannot but bring them forth?.

- v. Good works follow after Justification. taught again and again by S. Paul. While he insists strongly on faith as being the hand wherewith men embrace the righteousness wrought out for them by Christ, he insists equally strongly on the necessity of good works as the evidence of a man's continuance in a state of Justifica-Thus he writes: tion.
  - (a) To the Galatians, Let us not be weary in welldoing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not (Gal. vi. 9);
  - (b) And to the Ephesians, We are God's workman-

1 "Faith is the root of good works, in that the root and the rest of the tree being of the same substance, these two are in fact one, different expressions of the same habit of soul: the living faith is the good work still silently shut up in the soul, and the good Christian work is nothing other than the faith brought to light." Bp Forbes, p. 188. <sup>2</sup> "Faith does not cease with the first act, but continues. It works with obedience. In proportion as a man believes, so he obeys; they come together, and grow together, and last through life. Neither are perfect; both are on the same level of imperfection; they keep pace with each other; in proportion to the imperfection of one, so is the imperfection of the other; and as the one advances, so does the other also." Newman's Parochial Sermons, iii. p. 86.

ship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them (Eph. ii. 10)1;

(c) And to Titus, Fesus Christ gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a people for His own possession, zealous of good works (Titus ii. 14).

And the other Apostles agree with His teaching. For

- (a) S. James writes, As the body apart from the spirit is dead, even so faith apart from works is dead (Jas. ii. 26);
- (b) S. Peter says to his converts, So is the will of God, that by well doing ye put to silence the ignorance of foolish men (1 Pet. ii. 15);
- And S. John affirms, Hereby we know that we (c) love the children of God, when we love God, and do His commandments (I John v. 2).

We notice also that in the Eleventh Chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which professes to explain to us what faith is, the writer does so entirely by giving a list of the works which have sprung out of it, just as one, who wished to describe the excellence of a fruit-tree, would dwell on the beauty and excellence, not of the roots and leaves, but of the fruit2.

1 Αὐτοῦ γάρ ἐσμεν ποlημα, κτισθέντες ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ ἐπὶ ἔργοις ἀγαθοῖς. The expressions here are very strong. "The power of working does not spring out of ourselves, but from God, and therefore cannot have any intrinsic merit in it, for which we can claim salvation as a due...We are created anew in Christ Jesus, and were admitted into a state of salvation not because we have done good works, which merited salvation thereby; but we were admitted into that state by God's free grace, in order that we might do good works, which God before prepared for us as our appointed path to lead us to heaven." Bp C. Words-worth in loc. "Debetur enim merces bonis operibus si fiant; sed gratia, quæ non debetur, præcedit ut fiant." S. Aug. Op. Imp. contra Julianum, i. 133. "Gratia datur ante ullum laborem, unde quisque mercedem accipiet secundum laborem." Prosper, Sentent. S. Aug.

vi. Good Works Imperfect. But our good works "cannot put away our sins1, or endure the severity of God's Judgement." It is true that God takes delight in moral excellence, and, recognizing in it the work of His own Grace and of man's correspondence therewith, rewards it with further gifts of Grace. Non enim injustus Deus, ut obliviscatur operis vestri, et dilectionis. But our works fall very far short of that goodness, wherewith we ought to worship, praise, and honour God, and though of His exceeding long-suffering He does not reckon against us these defects and imperfections, yet if He were extreme to mark what is done amiss (Ps. cxxx. 3), we could none of us stand in His sight. If we say we have no sin, writes S. John to those who had been long in a state of salvation, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us (1 John i. 8).

vii. We must take care, however, not so to depreciate the value of man's part in the mighty cooperation due from him with the Grace of God as to represent great ventures of faith as less acceptable to God than they are. Our Lord Himself says Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit (John xv. 8), and again He says, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or mother, or father, or children, or lands, for My sake and the Gospel's sake, but he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time...and in the world to come eternal life (Mark x. 29, 30), and He warns all men that at the last day He will render to every man according to his deeds (Matt. xvi. 27). Hence S. Paul can assure (a) the Corinthians that their labour is not in vain in the Lord (I Cor. xv. 58), (b) the Romans that the sacrifice of their bodies is acceptable to God (Rom.

cannot keep a debtor and creditor account with God, and pay for the sins we love by certain acts, even the best." Bp Forbes On the Articles, p. 189.

xii. 1), (c) the Ephesians that we are created in Christ Iesus for good works (Eph. ii. 10), and S. James can declare that pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world (Jas. i. 27). We cannot elude the force of such passages as these. No man, indeed, can purchase heaven by his good works, for eternal life is the free gift of God in Christ Jesus (Rom. vi. 23)1, but good works done in the power of Christ and with the aid of His Spirit are pleasing and acceptable unto God. Their merit, whatever it be2, in its origin is not theirs, but the merit of Him, of Whom by Grace we are made living members3. Thus God crowns His own gifts in us, so that to Him, and to Him alone belongs, the glory, and the Apostle Paul can say, I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me (Gal. ii, 20).

viii. The Teaching of S. Paul and that of S. James have sometimes been supposed to be contrary the one to the other on the subject of faith and works. For

(a) S. Paul says, We reckon that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law<sup>4</sup> (Rom. iii, 28);

1 "Sin gives wages; the ruin which follows it is fairly earned; but the Christian's reward is, after all, a gift."

Vaughan in loc.

2 "Even the most active faith continues to confess, 'Meritum meum misericordia Domini,'and also 'Sufficia ad meritum scire, quod non sufficiant merita'." Oosterzee's Christian Dogmatics, p. 654, quoting Bernard of Clairvaux. "Deus quum coronat merita nostra, quid aliud coronat quam Sua dona?" Prosper Aquit. 309 c. Thus merit, like righteousness, though not "of us," is yet very really "in us," and is, no less than other fruits of Grace, our own, given to us as a possession by Him, Who with His Son gives all that constitutes satisfying moral life.

<sup>3</sup> Merit, in the theological sense of the term, is the fruit of Grace; God gives Sufficient Grace (Gratia sufficiens), or, as it is sometimes called, First Grace. Upon the use made of Sufficient Grace depends (speaking humanly and without limiting the mercy of God) the gift of Efficacious Grace (Gratia Efficax); the moral government of God, where good use of sufficient grace is made, being the pledge of such a gift, οὐ γὰρ ἄἰκος ὁ Θεὸς ἐπιλαθέσθαι τοῦ ἔργου ὑμῶν, καὶ τῆς ἀγάπης (Heb. vi. 10).

(b) While S. James writes, Faith apart from works is barren (Jas. ii. 20), and By works a man is justified and not only by faith (Jas. ii. 24).

But the expressions "faith" and "works," as employed by the two Apostles, have not precisely the same meaning. By "faith" S. Paul means a living active faith, and by "works" he means the ritual observances and external ceremonies of the Levitical Law<sup>1</sup>. S. James, on the other hand, means by "faith" a barren belief, a mere notional assent, and by "works" he means works of love and mercy. There is, therefore, no real contradiction between the two. S. Paul says we are justified by faith, that is a living faith, which must accordingly show itself by good works. S. James denies that we are justified by mere faith, that is a dead faith2, which does not prove itself by works worthy of the Christian profession. Thus S. James regards the faith that justifies as including the works of faith. S. Paul regards the faith that justifies as excluding the works of the Jewish ceremonial Law.

(as the ground of acceptance) any works of (belonging to, prescribed by) any law." Vaughan in loc.

24, and Godet on Rom. iii. 28.

The expression "dead works" (Heb. vi. 1; ix. 14) is so often used in mistaken contempt of moral effort, that it is not superfluous to observe that it is, in the context where it occurs, applied to the works of the Levitical Law, which, as works belonging to a defunct system, are themselves defunct; to make more of the expression is to fall into the fallacy of arguing a dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter. Comp. Westcott in loc.

ARTICLE XIII.

Opera ante Iustificationem.

Opera quæ fiunt ante gratiam Christi, et spiritus eius afflatum, cum ex fide Iesu Christi non prodeant, minimè Deo grata sunt: neque gratiam (ut multi uocant) de congruo merentur: Imo cum non sint facta ut Deus illa fieri uoluit et præcepit, peccati rationem habere non dubitamus.

Of workes before instification.

Workes done before the grace of Christe, and the inspiration of his spirite, are not pleasaunt to God, forasmuche as they spring not of fayth in Jesu Christ, neither do they make men meete to receaue grace, or (as the schole aucthours saye) descrue grace of congruitie: yea rather for that they are not done as GOD hath wylled and commaunded them to bee done, we doubt not, but thei haue the nature of sinne.

- i. Connection. The Thirteenth Article is another of the series respecting the precise value of good works, which it was deemed necessary to insert in consequence of the hot debates on the subject at the period of the Reformation.
- ii. The Title has always remained the same since the first draft in 1553. But there is an apparent discrepancy between it and the first clause. While the Title speaks of "Works before Justification," the body of the Article speaks of "Works done before the grace of Christ and the Inspiration of His Spirit." In an early draft of the Articles of 1553 both the Title and first clause agree<sup>1</sup>.

iii. Object. The design of the Article is to repudiate the Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian doctrines which to some extent characterized the Scotist theology<sup>1</sup> and were reproduced in much of the popular teaching of the Franciscans. Similar views found favour among the Anabaptists both at home and abroad. The compilers take the Thomist and Dominican side and assert that men do not, in any true sense, merit First Grace<sup>2</sup>.

iv. Congruous Merit is an ordinary technical term of the Schools. A man is said to merit Grace de congruo when the good work done is not properly commensurate with the Grace conferred, while at the same time it is congruous or fitting that it should be thus rewarded<sup>3</sup>. A man is said to merit Grace de condiguo when the good work done is properly commensurate with the Grace conferred and may be said to lay claim to it in strict justice.

v. Analysis. With regard to the Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian doctrines in question the Article states:—

(a) That apart from the Grace of God there cannot be such a thing as good works;

(b) That if works are done apart from His Grace, they will be so tainted with human infirmity, that instead of meriting First Grace<sup>4</sup>, they will harmonious. For the verb congruere, compare Ter. Phorm. iv. 4. 14, "mulier mulieri magis congruit"; Cic. Leg. i. 20. 53, "de re una solum dissident, de cæteris mirifice congruunt"; for the adjective compare Plaut. Mil. iv. 3. 23, "sermo cum illa congruus." Hence the expression de congruo is used when there is a certain congruity or fitness between the good work done and the reward received.

The Dominicans differed on this point from the Franciscans, and the Council of Trent strongly affirmed, against the Semi-Pelagian tendency of the latter, the inability of man to do good works without the Preventing Grace of God, "sine præveniente Spiritus Saacti inspiratione atque ejus adjutorio." Sarpi i. 344. Ed. Courayer.

<sup>3</sup> Congruus, from con and ruo, denotes (i) running or meeting together; (ii) agreeing with, or suitable to; (iii)

4 S. Thomas Aquinas in the course of his reply to the question, "Utrum homo possit sibi mereri primam gratiam," says:—

(1) "Iam etiam ipse actus fidei consequitur primam gratiam,

"have the nature of sin," that blended with them there will ever be the taint of inherent imperfection.

vi. Scripture teaching. And this is in accordance with the teaching of Scripture. For we learn from it that "the Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father," was the Light of men (John i. 4), not only during the brief period that He lived incarnate here on earth, but from the beginning, long before men knew Him in the flesh (John i. 9). Whatever virtue, therefore, there was in ancient times, or is amongst men, flowed not from any natural power of their own, but from Him, Who before He ever took upon Him our nature, was and is the One Source of Light and Life. He it is Who hath said and alone can say, I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life (John xiv. 6). Whatsoever good there was in a Job, a Ruth, a Naaman, in the repenting Ninevites1, Nebuchadnezzar, the good centurion of the Gospels, or Cornelius, was not due to anything in themselves, or to any inherent goodness of their own, which could attract or merit Initial Grace<sup>2</sup>. The Grace was there already, and it prompted their several actions3. As the good fruit is not the cause that the tree is good, but the tree must first be good before it can bring forth good fruit, so a man cannot without help from God so do good works as to be pleasing > et ita non potest esse meritorius primæ gratiæ";

(2) "Deus non dat gratiam nisi dignis, non tamen ita quod prius digni fuerint, sed quia Îpse per gratiam eos facit dignos";

(3) "Omne bonum opus hominis procedit a prima gratia sicut principio: non autem procedit a quocunque humano dono." Summa, II. Qu. cxiv. Art. 5.

1 It is noteworthy that it is the Ninevites, a heathen people, to whom our Lord so forcibly alludes, when He would teach the duty of repentance (Matt. xii. 41; Luke xi. 30).

2 "Cujus (Liberi Arbitrii) quippe conatus ad bonum, et cassi sunt, si a gratia non adjuvantur; et nulli, si non excitantur." S. Bernard, De Gratia et Lib. Arb. xiii. 42.

to Him. If he has done anything that is good, it has been because the Light that lighteth every man (John i. 9), even the Sun of righteousness, has already shone into his soul<sup>1</sup>.

vii. With whom does the Article not deal? The Article, it is to be carefully observed, does not deal with the final state of the heathen world, or with those who have never heard the Name of Christ, As Revelation is addressed to those whom it concerns, and tells us very little of the state of those to whom it is not addressed, so on these subjects the Article preserves a complete silence? We know that God willeth that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth (I Tim. ii. 4). This is His revealed will. Our business is to follow in the path marked out for us, and not to ask Lord, and what shall this man do? (John xxi. 21), for in respect to the heathen world we may be sure that the Judge of all the earth shall do right (Gen. xviii. 25), and He, Who received the heathen Syro-phœnician woman and the Roman centurion<sup>3</sup>, has Himself declared that many shall come from the East and the West, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac,

1 "In all the higher and purer regions of thought you are nearer Christ, even though His Name be not uttered... Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest...think on these things, for even if they do not bear His Name, they are assuredly in their essence His." Dr Liddon, Sermon reported in Church of England Pulpit, ix. p. 219. "Ora οῦν παρὰ πᾶσι καλῶς εἴρηται, ἡμῶν τῶν Χριστιανῶν ἐστι. Just. Mart. Αροί. ii. § 13.
2 "How God will deal with the

2 "How God will deal with the heathen who have never heard His Name, is not for us to say. It opens up an immense question, on which there has been no decision by the Church. While charity hopeth all things, no lax view should affect our sense of the duty of missionary exertion, or diminish our value for those assertions, which attach the attainment of everlasting life to such conditions as faith, baptism, and holiness." Bp Forbes, On the Articles, p. 206.

"Albeit the works of heathen men are not to be compared with the good works of faithful men engraffed in the Church of Christ; yet for many causes, and principally for that without all controversy all good gifts and endowments, even in the paynims, are God's good gifts, they have the title and name of good works in some respects given unto them." Bp Woolton's Christian Manual, p. 43. Ed. Parker Soc.

and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven: but the sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth into the outer darkness (Matt. viii. II, I2).

viii. With whom does the Article deal? What the Article really denies is that form of semi-Pelagian teaching, revived by some of the Scholastic divines, which, refusing to accept the doctrine of the innate corruption of man's nature<sup>1</sup>, asserted that he could of himself, apart from the Grace of God, do works entitling him to Initial Grace. What it asserts is that the spirit which would lead man to rely on his unassisted efforts, is not the spirit which is acceptable to God<sup>2</sup>. It is not the spirit of faith, nor that of grateful love in return for infinite benefits conferred<sup>3</sup>. It is impossible that works not done in union with the merits of our Lord, works, that is to say, not gratificata in Dilecto Filio Suo, should be intrinsically pleasant to God. They spring from a root of self-righteousness and it is difficult to see how they can fail to have "the nature of sin."

libet merita bona, quæ putant præcedere, ut justificentur per Dei gratiam: non intelligentes, cum hoc dicunt, nihil aliud quam se negare gratiam." S. Prosper. Aquit. 333 c.

ARTICLE XIV.

Opera Supererogationis.

Opera quæ supererogationis appellant, non possunt sine arrogantia et impietate prædicari. Nam illis declarant homines non tantum se Deo reddere quæ tenentur, sed plus in eius gratiam facere quam deberent: cum apertè Christus dicat: Cum feceritis omnia quæcunque præcepta sunt uobis, dicite: Serui inutiles sumus.

1,571.

Of workes of supererogation.

Voluntarie workes besydes, ouer and aboue Gods commaundementes, which they call workes of supererogation, can not be taught without arrogancie and impietie. For by them men do declare that they do not onely render vnto God as muche as they are bounde to do, but that they do more for his sake then of bounden duetie is required: Wheras Christe sayth playnly, When ye haue done al that are commaunded to you, say, We be vnprofitable seruantes.

- i. Connection. The Fourteenth is another supplementary Article on the subject of good works. If, as we have seen, by our own works we cannot please God, and if those done, even after the reception of Grace, are acceptable only in Christ, while those done apart from the Grace of God have the nature of sin, is it possible for any to do more good works than of bounden duty is required of them, since every good work is simply an act of correspondence to Grace received?
- ii. Language. This is what has sometimes been asserted, and it is with this doctrine respecting "works of supererogation" that the Article is concerned. The only point respecting its language, which requires notice, is that the English clause "voluntary works besides, over and

- iii. Supererogation is a Latin ecclesiastical word and came into English through the Vulgate, where it occurs as the translation of the injunction of the good Samaritan to the host at the inn respecting the man who fell amongst thieves, Take care of him, and whatsoever thou spendest more (quodcunque supererogaveris), I, when I come again, will repay thee<sup>2</sup>. In Classical Latin the word Erogare was specially applied to paying out money from the public treasury<sup>3</sup>. Supererogare, therefore, would denote to pay out more than is needed, and as an ecclesiastical expression it meant to pay out or give to God more than one was bound to do.
- iv. Origin of the doctrine. The idea of works of supererogation gradually grew up in the Church, and was due to three chief causes:—
  - (α) The admiration of the early Church for martyrs and martyrdom;
  - (β) The belief in the superior merits of the celibate life;
  - (γ) The increasing respect paid in the Middle Ages to all kinds of ascetic practices.

Out of these causes arose the doctrine that there is a difference between the precepts of Christ, which are of universal obligation, and counsels of perfection, which were enjoined on those who could receive them. Such moral and religious duties, as were equally needful for all, belonged to the first class, while martyrdom, celibacy, virginity, and voluntary poverty belonged to the second. These latter, being voluntary works, were called "works of supererogation," and the excess of merit thus attained by the saints formed part of the treasury at the disposal of the Church for the benefit of her members<sup>2</sup>.

- v. Certain Passages of Scripture are regarded as supporting the idea of works of supererogation.
  - (a) Such is the counsel given by our Lord to the rich young ruler<sup>3</sup>, who approached Him with the question Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? To him our Lord replied Keep the Commandments, and referred him to those of the second Table. Then, when the young man answered that he had kept all these<sup>4</sup>, and enquired What lack I yet? he received the reply, One thing thou lackest<sup>5</sup>; go, opus bonum, a Christo nobis non imperatum sed demonstratum, non mandatum sed commendatum." Bellarm. De Monachis, Bk ii. cap. vii.; S. Thomas Aquin. Summa, Pt. ii. 108, Art. iv.

We have an illustration of this in

We have an illustration of this in the Libellatici of the early Church, who obtained tickets from martyrs and confessors qualifying them for restoration to the Church, inasmuch as the superior merits of these sufferers for the Faith made up for their own deficiencies. We have such a letter preserved in the correspondence of Cyprian, Epp. xxiii. Such a conception aided in the development of the use of Indulgences, which were granted out of the treasure of the Church, of which, while one part was her dower as "the bride of Christ," the other part was Works of Supererogation. Comp. Creighton, Hist. of the Papacy, v. pp. 59 sqq. The development of the doctrine of a thesaurus meritorum or a thesaurus supererogationis perfectorum belongs to Alexander of Hales. Summa, Pars iv., Quæst. 23, Art. 2, membr. 5.

3 Matt. xix. 16—30; Mark x. 17—31; Luke xviii. 18—30. He was young (Matt. xix. 22), of great wealth, and an ἄρχων (Luke xviii. 18), or ruler of a local synagogue, as was Jairus.

4 We are told that when the Angel

We are told that when the Angel of death came to fetch the Rabbi Chanina, he said, "Go and fetch me the Book of the Law, and see whether there be anything in it which I have not kept." Farrar's Life of Christ, ii. 161, n.

"The work to be done is to love. Jesus quotes the second Table, as bearing on works of a more external and palpable kind, and consequently more like one of those which the sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow Me (Mark x. 211). Upon this it is observed that we have here not a general command but a counsel of perfection2, and if the young man had adopted it, he would have done more than his duty, and performed a work of supererogation3. But it is plain that the answer was made to the young man's question What lack I yet? and our Lord told him what he lacked. Now if he lacked anything, it is plain that the supplying of that deficiency could not amount to a work of supererogation, but simply of duty and obligation, and it could not qualify him for a supereminent degree of glory4.

(b) Again, arguments are drawn from certain words of our Lord respecting marriage and celibacy in such passages as Matt. xix. 10—12, and young man expected to be mentioned. This answer of Jesus is earnest; for to love is to live!" Godet on Luke xviii. 20.

1 Or as S. Matthew records, El  $\theta \dot{\epsilon} \lambda \epsilon i s$   $\tau \dot{\epsilon} \lambda \epsilon i s$   $\epsilon l \nu a \iota \iota = i f$  thou art resolved to be perfect.

2 "Undoubtedly, according to the view of Jesus, man cannot do more or better than fulfil the Law (Matt. v. 17, 48). Only the Law must be obeyed not in the letter but in the spirit. The perfection to which Jesus called the young man is not the fulfilling of law superior to the Law strictly so called, but the real fulfilling, in opposition to that external, literal fulfilling which the young man already had. This one thing which he lacks is the spirit of the Law, that is love ready to give everything: this is the whole of the Law (Luke vi.)." Godet on Luke xviii, 21, of S. Paul in I Cor. vii. 1-7, 25-40. But it is to be observed that, while both our Lord and S. Paul regard the celibate life and abstinence from marriage as deserving of all commendation in certain cases and for certain definite ends. where men are able to receive it (Matt. xix. II), vet in other places the highest praise is bestowed upon the holy estate of matrimony. And while it is admitted that it is well to adopt the celibate life, if men wish to avoid entangling themselves with earthly ties and worldly business, yet nowhere is any hint dropped that by such abstinence from wedlock men do more than win their own salvation, or that celibacy has in itself a special merit, or can confer a higher place in heaven.

vi. The Teaching of the Article. Respecting this doctrine of Works of Supererogation the Article lays down (1) that it "cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety," and (2) that it plainly contradicts the clear declaration of Christ Himself. It cannot be taught without arrogancy, for it is utterly opposed to the humility, which Christ requires of all His disciples, and it cannot be taught without impiety, for it tends to establish a source of merit, not free like the merit of Christ, but purchasable. It plainly contradicts His own words, for He expressly declared to His Apostles, When ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which it was our duty to do (Luke xvii. 10)<sup>2</sup>.

vii. Conclusion. If, then, as we have seen, it is the teaching of Revelation that the taint of original sin remains even "in them that are regenerated," and thus vitiates any claim that may be set up for good works done by us apart from Grace, it is plain à fortiori that no amount of human obedience can render unto God more than He may demand, or more than man of his bounden duty is required to offer. We need not, indeed, hesitate to believe that every act of self-renunciation, to which a man is called and for which he receives Grace, is rewarded. But such an act, for the doer, becomes, however rare and exceptional, a very precept of the Gospel<sup>1</sup>. The idea that a man can attain such a degree of supereminent merit that the excess can be made available for others, is unsupported by any teaching in Holy Scripture. We cannot conceive of any, even the most exalted saint, attaining to a higher degree of sanctity than is set forth by our Lord, not as a counsel of perfection, but as a precept for daily life, Ye therefore shall be perfect2, as your heavenly Father is perfect (Matt. v. 48).

very best performances with that which God requires of us: when we call to mind that nothing short of the perfection of God is the standard whereby we shall be measured, and that in Him lie hidden not only all possible perfections that are or ever have been in any of His creatures, but that beyond that there is the inscrutable perfection which is His own attribute...Unprofitable servants! What but unprofitable, in view of the truth that God needs not one of us, that He is in Himself complete in all things, and that the addition or subtraction of a universe adds nothing to, takes nothing from His perfection." Bp Forbes On the Articles, pp. 214, 215.

We may note in this connection the inherent value of sacrifice. "The good to be sought is not made up of pleasures, nor the evil to be avoided made up of pains. The end for the which sacrifice is demanded is one which in the sacrifice itself is in some measure attained ... the individual's sacrifice of an inclination, harmless or even in its way laudable, for the sake of a higher good, is itself already in some measure an attainment of the higher good." Green, Proleg. Eth., p. 420, Ed. 1884.

The future here has an imperative force, ἔσεσθε τέλειοι. The latter word is limited by the preceding words=perfect in respect of love, i.e. "love your enemies as well as your neighbours," because your Father, being perfect in respect of love, doeth

Nemo præter Christum sine peccato.

Christus in nostræ naturæ ueritate per omnia similis factus est nobis, excepto peccato, à quo prorsus erat immunis, tum in carne tum in spiritu. Venit, ut Agnus absque macula esset, qui mundi peccata per immolationem sui semel factam, tolleret: et peccatum (ut inquit Ioannes) in eo non erat. Sed nos reliqui, etiam baptizati, et in Christo regenerati, in multis tamen offendimus omnes: Et si dixerimus quia peccatum non habemus, nos ipsos seducimus, et veritas in nobis non est.

Of Christe alone without sinne.

Christe in the trueth of our nature, was made lyke vnto vs in al thinges (sinne only except) from which he was clearley voyde, both in his fleshe, and in his spirite. He came to be the lambe without spot, who by the sacrifice of hym self once made, shoulde take away the sinnes of the worlde: and sinne, (as S. John sayeth) was not in hym. But al we the rest, (although baptized, and borne agayne in Christe) yet offende in many thinges, and if we say we haue no sinne, we deceaue our selues, and the trueth is not in vs.

- i. Connection. The Fifteenth Article supplements and strengthens the one which goes before it. The Mystical Anabaptists of the Sixteenth Century denied the verity of Christ's Manhood, contending that it was not derived from the Blessed Virgin. On the other hand, the Rationalistic Anabaptists, John Denk and others, were contending that our Lord was no more than our great Example, and that to regard Him as our Holy Redeemer, whose perfect and sinless life and death have delivered us from the guilt and power of sin, is of the nature of idolatry.
- ii. Object. Its object, then, is to show that while the taint of sin, which man carries with him from his cradle to his grave, vitiates the good works even of the most saintly, there is one and one only exception to the law of universal sinfulness, and that is our Divine Redeemer.

- iii. Analysis. Respecting our Lord the Article asserts
  - (α) That "in the truth of our nature" He "was made like unto us in all things," sin only excepted, from which He was absolutely free<sup>2</sup>, both in His flesh, and in His spirit;
  - (β) That being free from sin, He could be, and came into the world to be, "the Lamb without spot, who by the sacrifice<sup>3</sup> of Himself once made, should take away the sins of the world," and sin was not in Him<sup>4</sup>;
  - (γ) That as for the rest of mankind, so far from our being able to do works of supereminent merit, we are not able to satisfy the ordinary requirements of God's Law, and although baptized and regenerated in Christ, yet in many things we offend all (James iii. 2).

Observe the force of the expression "in nostræ naturæ veritate." As our Lord was "Verus Deus," consubstantial with the Father from all eternity, so He became "Verus Homo," consubstantial with us in all the details of a common humanity. See Introduction to the Creeds, pp. 103, 104. "Our Lord actually assumed our human nature, with all its attributes, its sinless infirmities, its faculties and powers, into His Divine Person, so that as He has become a sharer in our human nature, we have become partakers of the Divine." Bp Forbes, p. 217.

<sup>2</sup> Absolutely free, or "Clearelie uoide," English Version of 1553. He was like unto us χώρις ἀμαρτίας (Heb. iv. 15). He not only did not sin, but there was not in His Holy Manhood any subjective condition to meet the approach of temptation

Note the word for sacrifice here, immolationem. This word from in and mola denotes (1) literally the sprinkling of the victim with the salt cake (mola salsa); (2) the bringing as an offering; (3) a sacrifice. Comp. Cic. Div. i. 52. 119, "In ipso immolationis tempore." Because the sprinkling of the victim in this manner was so important, immolare could be used to express the entire action of sacrifice, including the slaying and burning on the altar. See Freeman's Principles of Divine Service, ii. p. 76.

<sup>4</sup> See I John iii. 5, ἀμαρτία ἐν αὐτῶ οὐκ ἔστι. "The tense (is not was) marks the eternal character of the Redeemer. All that belongs to His 'perfected' Manhood (Heb. ii. 10, v. 9) 'is' in Him no less than His unchanged Divinity." Westcott in loc.

- iv. Scripture Proof of the first Statement. Scripture clearly teaches us that our Lord assumed our humanity with all its attributes, faculties, and powers, so that no one element of human nature was wanting to it. But though He took upon Him our nature, it was not essential that He should take upon Him our sinfulness, for sin is not a part but "the fault and corruption" of our nature. That He "was made like unto us in all things," sin only excepted, is the testimony alike of the Gospels and Epistles:—
  - (i) Of the Gospels: For
    - (α) When the angel Gabriel announced to the Blessed Virgin that the Holy Ghost should come upon her, and the power of the Highest should overshadow her, he adds, wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God (Luke i. 35)²;
    - (β) And as He grew up to man's estate, it is distinctly said of Him that He advanced, not only in wisdom and stature, but in favour with God and men (Luke ii. 52)<sup>3</sup>;
    - (γ) During His earthly Ministry not only does He never hint that He has taught, or said, or done anything which needs forgiveness<sup>4</sup>, but

"Entering into human life in this way, Our Lord was placed in the normal condition of man before his fall, and put in a position to fulfil the career originally set before man, in which He was to advance from innocence to holiness." Godet in

<sup>3</sup> Προέκοπτε σοφία καὶ ἡλικία, καὶ χάριτι παρὰ Θεῷ καὶ ἀνθρώποις, Luke ii. 52. Προέκοπτε, note the force of the imperfect tense. His advance was natural, not premature, or forced. "In virtue of His own holy nature, He repelled the impure and sinful as alien to His very being from childhood upwards, and received and appropriated only what would serve as an element for His normal development." Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p. 278.

<sup>4</sup> He teaches His disciples to pray Forgive us our debts, but "we never hear from His lips confession of sin

He declares positively I do always the things that are pleasing to Him [My Father<sup>1</sup>] (John viii. 29), and He challenges those who had known intimately His going out and His coming in, saying, Which of you convicteth Me of sin? (John viii. 46);

- (a) S. Peter says of Him that He was the Holy and Righteous One (Acts iii. 14), that He did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth (1 Pet. ii. 22)<sup>3</sup>;
- (b) S. Paul says, Him, Who knew no sin, God made sin on our behalf (2 Cor. v. 21);
- (c) And S. John writes, He was manifested to take away sins<sup>4</sup>; and in Him is no sin (1 John iii. 5).

and sorrow on account of any contradiction between what He was and what He should have been—a confession, a sorrow, which we hear from all the noblest and best of men." Ibid. p. 287; see also Liddon's Bampton Lectures, pp. 246—250, Ed. 1877.

1 Έγὼ τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτῷ ποιῶ πάντοτε, John viii. 29; the emphasis here is on ἐγὼ, in mournful contrast to the Jews, and on πάντοτε (on every occasion), which stands last in the sentence. The theory that Jesus was merely the holiest and noblest of teachers, shatters against such words as these. What saint or prophet ever dared to say, "The things that are pleasing to God I in every instance do"? and yet "Hæc summa cum suavitate dixit Dominus." Bengel.

2 "Ερχεται γὰρ ὁ τοῦ κόσμου ἄρχων και ἐν ἐμοὶ οὐκ ἔχει οὐδέν. "Οὐδὲν ἔχειν signifies to have neither right nor power over the object of his hatred. This saying implied in Him Who pronounced it, a consciousness of perfect innocence." Godet in loc.

3 On the special force of the testimony of the companions of our Lord's earthly ministry see a striking sermon of Professor Mozley, Parochial and Occasional Sermons, p. 278 sqq.

4 "Iva τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἄρη = "that He

4 "Iva τὰs ἀμαρτίαs ἄρη = "That He may take away sins, not simply do away with the punishment of them." Tollit autem et dimittendo quæ facta

These passages make it clear that our Lord was a perfect representative of our race, that of our nature He was a partaker in everything that constitutes complete manhood, excepting only that which was no proper part but only the fault and corruption of our nature, namely, sin<sup>1</sup>.

v. Scripture Proof of the Second Statement. From the dogmatic statement of our Lord's perfect sinlessness the Article, "rising into something like religious fervour?," proceeds to affirm that He came to be "the Lamb without spot," the Eternal Victim for sin. Under the old Law the typical lamb of the Jewish Passover was required to be without spot or blemish (Exod. xii. 5), but the priest himself was compassed about with sinful infirmity. He had therefore to offer both for his own sins and the sins of the people (Heb. v. 2, 3). Under the New Dispensation, on the other hand, the functions of offerer and oblation met and were united in the spotless Person of our Lord, who was

"Himself the Victim, and Himself the Priest."

Hence He could say with absolute truth at the Institution of the Holy Eucharist, This is My Blood of the Covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins (Matt. xxvi. 28)<sup>3</sup>, and the sinless nature of our Divine Redeemer supplied His special aptitude for that sacrificial function, which He commenced when He offered up Himself upon the altar of His Cross, and which He now continues in that world, sunt et adjuvando ne fiant et perducendo ad vitam ubi fieri omnino non possint." Bede quoted by Westcott in loc., who observes that the use of the plural "sins" (ràs àµaprias) brings out "the manifold personal realisations of the sin of humanity which Christ takes away. The phrase stands without further definition (sins, not our sins) in order to include the fulness of

* Hence also S. Peter can say, Ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, with silver or gold, ...but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, (even the blood) of Christ, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19: comp. also Hebrews viii. 26—28.

whither He is gone, and where His glorious Body pleads "without words" by its very presence within the true Holy of Holies the efficacy of His one perfect sacrifice.

vi. Scripture Proof of the Third Statement. The Article now proceeds to assert in broad terms the actual sinfulness of all the rest of mankind. This has been already stated in the Ninth Article. Here it will be sufficient to assert that according to the teaching of Scripture, in spite of the fact that by Baptism we have been born again in Christ and placed in a state of Grace, yet, as a matter of fact, we all offend in many things (Jas. iii. 2)1. In many respects we do not live up to our profession, nor avail ourselves of God's promised aid to resist temptation as it arises. And therefore Christ has taught us in His Pattern Prayer to pray daily that God will forgive us our trespasses?, that "as we through the frailty of our nature are always subject unto sin, so we should always exercise the acts of repentance, and for ever seek the favour of God3," for, as S. John reminds us, If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us; if we confess our sins, God4 is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness (I John i. 8, 9).

vii. Apparent Exceptions. It is to be noticed that the Article does not speak of any exceptional cases. It says "all we the rest." But it has sometimes been asked, is necessarily supplied from the context...The epithet 'faithful' ($\pi\sigma ro t s\) is applied to God not unfrequently in the Pauline epistles as being One who will fulfil His promises (Heb. x. 23, xi. 11), and complete what He has begun (1 Thess. v. 24; 1 Cor. i. 9), and guard those who trust in Him (1 Cor. x. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 13), because this is His nature; comp. 1 Pet. iv. 19."  iii. 2). Note the emphasis on the ἄπαντες, as indicated by its position.

Are not Zacharias and Elizabeth spoken of as blameless, (Luke i. 6), and does not S. Paul speak of himself as having lived in all good conscience before God? (Acts xxiii. 1). To this it may be replied:—

- (α) It is true that S. Luke tells us that Zacharias and Elizabeth were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless (Luke i. 6). But the blamelessness here spoken of is not a moral but a legal blamelessness, and the righteousness alluded to is not a moral but a ceremonial righteousness. Zacharias could not have attained to a moral perfection, or he would not have disbelieved the angel, when he promised him a son, and so have incurred the penalty of dumbness for his want of faith.
- (β) Again, when S. Paul says of himself that up to this day he deemed himself to have lived before God in all good conscience (Acts xxiii. I), and that as touching the righteousness which is of the Law he was found blameless² (Phil. iii. 6), he does not mean to represent that he was morally perfect, otherwise he never would have said that he found it necessary to buffet his body, and bring it into bondage (I Cor. ix. 27), and he never would have spoken of himself, when Paul the aged and Paul the prisoner, as not counting himself yet to have apprehended, but as still forgetting the things suggests the inspection of a sacrificial victim by a  $\mu\omega\mu\delta\sigma\kappa\sigma\sigma\sigma$ s and its recognition as  $\delta\mu\omega\mu\omega\sigma$ s, free from legal blemish. The same verbal adjective is used in Luke i. 6.

which were behind, and stretching forward to the things that were before (Phil. iii. 13).

viii. The Blessed Virgin. In making the statements which it does, the Article also denies by implication the Scholastic dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin<sup>1</sup>, which asserted that she was not only conspicuously holy, but, like her Divine Son, free from the taint not merely of actual but also of original sin. The development of the doctrine admits of division into distinct historical epochs:

- (a) During the first four centuries there is little to be found on the subject. S. Cyril of Jerusalem, though he dwells much on the birth of our Lord from a pure Virgin, and gives His Mother the title of Theotokos, is absolutely silent as to her Immaculate Conception;
- (b) When the Pelagians urged that S. Mary, amongst others, had lived without actual sin, S. Augustine refused to discuss her case. "Concerning the Holy Virgin Mary I am not willing for the honour of our Lord that any dispute be held, when we are speaking about sin. For how do we know what more Grace was bestowed on her wholly to overcome sin, who had the honour to conceive and bring forth Him Who certainly had no sin<sup>3</sup>?"
- (c) The pious and reasonable belief, founded upon the language of the Liturgies and of the Fathers,

mini nullam prorsus, cum de peccatis agitur, haberi volo quæstionem: unde enim scimus, quid ei plus gratiæ collatum fuerit ad vincendum omni ex parte peccatum, quæ concipere ac parere meruit quem constat nullum habuisse peccatum?" S. Aug. De Natura et Gratia, xxxvi.

- that S. Mary was free at least from mortal sin led, in course of time, to the suggestion that she was conceived free from original sin;
- In the Twelfth Century<sup>1</sup> the doctrine became so far established as to be introduced by the Canons of Lyons into their ecclesiastical offices, A.D. 1136. But when in A.D. 1140 they proceeded to institute a special Festival in honour of the doctrine, Bernard of Clairvaux<sup>2</sup>, clearly perceiving that thus the specific difference between our Saviour and the rest of mankind was endangered, strongly opposed both the new doctrine and the Festival, and complained that so respected a Church as that of Lyons "should have introduced what was unknown to Church practice, unapproved by reason, and uncommended by ancient tradition3."
  - The Festival<sup>4</sup>, however, spread with the deepening devotion to the Virgin, though the Schoolmen Albert the Great, Bonaventura<sup>5</sup>, S. Thomas Aquinas<sup>6</sup>, and the Dominicans generally were

1 The controversy on the Immaculate Conception was preceded by that carried on between Paschasius Radbertus and Ratramnus concerning the virginity of S. Mary. See Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, ii. p. 262.

<sup>2</sup> See Bernardi Ep. 174 ad Canonicos Lugdunenses, quoted by Gieseler, ii. 2. s. 429. S. Bernard admitted that S. Mary was sanctified in the womb, but he did not from this draw the inference that she was free from original sin. Comp. Milman's Latin Christianity, ix. 75, Ed. 1872, and Gieseler, Hist. Eccl. iii. 345.

See Hagenbach, Hist. Doct. ii. p.

4 In the thirteenth century it was widely observed, but only as a Festum

Conceptionis in general, and not as the Festum Conceptionis Immaculatæ. In the English Calendar it was included for the first time by Archbp Islip's Constitutions, A.D. 1362, though it has been asserted that it was so included at Archbp Langton's Council at Oxford, A.D. 1222.

Sent. lib. iii. dist. 3, art. i. qu. 2.

6 S. Thomas's view is (i) That there was a sanctificatio "in utero a peccato originali, quantum ad maculam personalem," but not a liberatio "a reatu, quo tota natura tenebatur obnoxia"; (ii) That this sanctificatio was an zealous in opposition. Even Duns Scotus, who endeavoured to defend the novel doctrine by subtle reasoning, only maintained that it was the more probable among the different possibilities. The Church for a long time hesitated without coming to a decision, and at the Council of Trent the doctrine became the subject of such keen dispute, that the Pope was obliged to forbid any further discussion, lest it should lead to an open schism. Finally a compromise was effected, and in the decree it was laid down that the Council had no intention to include the Blessed Virgin in the consequences of original sin.

(f) Since then the Dogma has been awakened from the slumber into which it seemed to have sunk, and was brought to a definite decision by the Bull of Pope Pius IX., Dec. 8, 1854, yet not without serious objections and opposition even within the Roman Church itself.

ix. The Teaching of the Church of England respecting the honour due to the Blessed Virgin has always been marked by sobriety and reverence. She does not hesitate to ascribe to her the highest conceivable dignity, considering the ineffable privilege which was conferred upon her. She preserves two red letter, and three black letter Festivals in her memory<sup>2</sup>, and in the Collect for Christmas

2 The Purification of the Virgin on Feb. 2; the Annunciation on March 25. She also preserves in her Calendar the Black Letter Days, the Conception on Day dwells on our Lord's birth of a "pure Virgin," and in the Proper Preface for the day asserts that He "was made very Man of the substance of the Virgin Mary His Mother, and that without spot of sin1." But she nowhere inculcates as a matter of faith the suspension in the case of the Virgin of the law of the Fall, nor holds that by reason of her Immaculate Conception she was absolutely free from original sin. If the doctrine in such a sense is true, it not only exempts the Blessed Virgin from all original taint, but places her in a sphere by herself beyond the common need of salvation2. The regeneration of the world is thus made to begin not with our Lord, but with her, and instead of springing sinless out of the sinful race He came to save3, He derives His Humanity from something not like unto the rest of us. That His Mother should have been in the order of nature until she conceived Him seems to belong to the truth of the Incarnation4.

Dec. 8; the Nativity on Sep. 8; and the Visitation of the B. Virgin on July 2.

<sup>1</sup> Again in the "Homily of Repentance" she speaks of Jesus Christ, "who being true and natural God, did at the time appointed take upon Him our frail nature in the Blessed Virgin's womb, and that of her undefiled substance, so that He might be a Mediator between God and us."

We find no trace of the doctrine in the Gospels or Epistles. S. Matthew, who gives us his genealogy of our Lord, records amongst the only ancestresses whom he mentions, the names of the incestuous Tamar (Matt. i. 3), and the harlot Rahab (Matt. i. 4), of the heatheness Ruth (Matt. i. 5) and the adulterous wife of Uriah (Matt. i. 6). "The purity of the last stage in the transmission was not actually more necessary to our Lord's incorruption than that of the earlier stages." Mason's Faith of the Gospels, p. 129, Ed. 2.

Faith of the Gospels, p. 129, Ed. 2.

4 See Bp Browne On the Articles, pp. 352—354, and Bp Forbes, pp. 226, 227. The Bonn Conference in 1874 rejected the doctrine "as being contrary to the tradition of the first thirteen centuries, according to which Christ alone is conceived without sin." See the Report of the Conference, pp. 55—60.

ARTICLE XVI.

De Lapsis post Baptismum.

Non omne peccatum mortale post baptismum uoluntariè perpetratum, est peccatum in Spiritum sanctum et irremissibile. Proinde lapsis à baptismo in peccata, locus poenitentie non est negandus. Post acceptum spiritum sanctum, possumus à gratia data recedere atque peccare, denuóque per gratiam Dei resurgere ac resipiscere. Ideóque illi damnandi sunt, qui se quamdiu hic viuant, amplius non posse peccare affirmant, aut verè resipiscentibus pœnitentiæ locum denegant.

Of sinne after Baptisme.

Not every deadly sinne willingly committed after baptisme, is sinne agaynst the holy ghost, and vnpardonable. Wherefore, the graunt of repentaunce is not to be denyed to such as fal into sinne after baptisme. After we have receaved the holy ghost, we may depart from grace geven, and fall into sinne, and by the grace of God (we may) aryse agayne and amend our lyues. And therefore, they are to be condemned, whiche say they can no more sinne as long as they lyue here, or denie the place of forgevenesse to such as truely repent.

- i. Connection. But if Christ is alone without spot of sin, and we are pure only so far as we partake of His purity, what is to be said of those who, after being made members of His Body by Baptism, commit deadly sin? Are we to hold, as some did in the early Church, and as some taught in the sixteenth century, that for such there is no hope of pardon? Or are we to believe that a man once reconciled to God and admitted into Covenant with Him, cannot fall from Grace given?
- ii. The Title. To both these questions the Sixteenth Article contains an answer. Its present Title, however, differs considerably from that which it bore in 1563, when it ran "De lapsis post Baptismum," "Concerning those who have fallen after Baptism," and still more from the Title which it bore in 1553, "De Peccato in Spiritum Sanctum," "Concerning Sin against the Holy Ghost." The present Title is a more general one, "De Peccato post Baptismum," "Of Sin after Baptism."

- iii. The Erroneous Views held on this subject in the early Church were those of the Montanists and Novatians:—
  - (α) The Montanists regarded it as their special task to reform Christian Life and Church discipline, in view of the expected second Coming of our Lord, and they held that the Church had no right to grant assurance of forgiveness to those who had broken their Baptismal vows by grievous sin¹;
  - (β) The Novatians, who derived their name from Novatian, a presbyter of Rome in the third century, taught that every mortal sin committed after Baptism is unpardonable, and that, therefore, the lapsed, or those who had fallen into apostasy during the Decian persecution, had no more hope of salvation, and could not be restored to the Church<sup>2</sup>.
- iv. The same Erroneous Views were reproduced in the sixteenth century by a section of the Anabaptists, who appeared in great numbers in Essex and Kent<sup>3</sup>. They taught that all hope of pardon is taken away from those, who fall into sin after having received the Holy Ghost, and at the same time held that a man once reconciled to God "is without sin, and free from all stain of concupiscence, and that nothing of the old Adam remains in his nature; and a man, they say, who is thus regenerate, cannot sin<sup>1</sup>."

- v. Analysis. In opposition to such views the Article asserts
  - (I) That "not every deadly sin<sup>2</sup> willingly committed after Baptism is sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable";
  - (2) That "the grant of repentance" is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after Baptism";
  - (3) That "after we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, and rise again and amend our lives," and that "they are to be condemned, which say, they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the place of forgiveness to such as truly repent."

<sup>2</sup> Peccatum mortale. This expression is grounded on the words 1 John v. 16. It does not mean a sin committed in weakness or through the violence of some sudden temptation, but a sin committed wilfully, with the full consent of the will (voluntarie), and a consciousness of the guilt of the act.

<sup>3</sup> Locus pænitentiæ seems to be derived from μετανοίας τόπος in Heb. xii. 17. It was a Roman law term. In 1553 it was translated "the place for penitents," alluding to the custom in the early Church of reserving a place as far as possible from the altar for penitents, before they were received back into full communion by the Bishop or other authorities of the Church.

4 Resipiscere, from re and sapere = (1) to taste again; (2) to recover one's senses, to come to oneself again, comp. Plautus Mil. Glor. iv. 8. 24, "Afferte aquam dum resipiscit"; (3) to become reasonable, to repent or amend.

The remissibility of post-Baptis-

"The remissibility of post-Baptismal sin is essential to Christianity as (a) A Paternal Religion, for the God of Christianity is a Father; His forbearance (Rom. ii. 4) and His punishment (Ps. xcix. 8) are both alike evidence of His care for His children

Baptism may be deduced from the teaching (1) of our Lord, and (2) of His Apostles:—

(a) The teaching of our Lord:

- (1) When the Apostles asked Him to teach them to pray, He gave them the Lord's Prayer, and in it He taught them, as He teaches us, to say Forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us (Luke xi. 4). He nowhere limits these words, or tells us that under certain circumstances the baptized children of God may not use this Prayer, because forgiveness is impossible;
- (2) Again in the Parable of the Prodigal Son He describes how not a stranger but a son left his father's house, and went into a far country, and there wasted his substance in riotous living, and yet on his repentance was welcomed home and pardoned (Luke xv. 11—32);
- (3) He gave to His Apostles the power of binding and loosing (Matt. xviii. 18), and He ratified this gift after He rose from the dead, saying, Whosesoever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained (John xx. 23). He nowhere hints that the Grace of forgiveness does not apply to those who sin after Baptism.

(Ps. ciii. passim; I Pet. v. 7); it is also essential to it as (b) An Idealistic Religion; the Founder of Christianity has been the most powerful, because the most tranquil exponent of the view that "morality is the nature of things," that "the highest ideal is at the same time the deepest reality of the world." Such idealism constitutes a religion of hope, immeasurably the more hopeful, where "Love comes to quicken hope." John iii. 16, 17; Rom. v. 5 sqq. See Caird, Evolution of Religion, ii. pp. 139, 275; Fowle, Why do men remain Christians? Contemp. Review, p. 120, Jan. 1893.

(β) The teaching of the Apostles:

- (1) Here S. Peter naturally claims the first place, for not only had he himself been forgiven after a fall, which might well have been believed to place him beyond the power of absolution, but we find him extending the hope of pardon even to Simon Magus<sup>1</sup>. This man had been baptized (Acts viii, 13), and yet was declared by the Apostle to be in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity (Acts viii. 23). Nevertheless S. Peter urges him to repentance, and bids him pray the Lord, if perhaps the thought of his heart shall be forgiven him (Acts viii. 22);
- Again S. Paul was confronted at Corinth with (2) an instance of gross immorality, and he passes on the offender the sentence of excommunication (I Cor. v. I-8). But when the incestuous person has given proof of his sorrow and repentance, the Apostle orders him to be restored to communion, lest he should be swallowed up with his overmuch sorrow2 (2 Cor. ii. 7). So also the same Apostle exhorts the Galatians, if a man be overtaken in any trespass, to restore such a one in a spirit of meekness (Gal. vi. 1)3;
- In like manner S. John, writing to baptized (3)Christians, exhorts them, on the one hand, <sup>2</sup> And the Apostle declares that the very object he had in view, when he passed the sentence, was that his spirit might be saved in the day of the

not to sin<sup>1</sup>, and on the other bids them, if they fall into sin, not to despair, for we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He<sup>2</sup> is the propitiation for our sins (I John ii. I, 2).

- vii. Objections. But it is urged that certain passages seem to militate against this view of the remissibility of post-Baptismal sin. Thus our Lord says, Every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven...but whosoever shall speak against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come (Matt. xii. 31, 32). Now here it is to be observed that
  - (a) This awful warning arose out of the fact that the Pharisees had dared to ascribe our Lord's miracles of mercy to Satan and Beelzebub (Matt. xii. 24), rather than allow that He, Who wrought them, was that which He claimed to be;
  - (b) Our Lord does not affirm that even they had committed sin against the Holy Spirit, though doubtless they were very near committing it<sup>8</sup>;
  - (c) He mercifully warns them of the peril, which they were bringing upon themselves, and of the

<sup>2</sup> Kal αὐτόs, et ipse Vulg. and He, or rather, and He Himself. "The emphatic pronoun enforces the thought of the efficacy of Christ's advocacy as 'righteous.' He who pleads our cause, having fulfilled the destiny of man, is at the same time the propitiation for our sins." Westcott in loc.

8 "To speak against the Holy Ghost is to speak against the clear voice of conscience, to call good evil and light darkness, to pursue goodness as such with malignity and hatred. Such sin, or sinful state, cannot be forgiven since from its very nature it excludes the idea of repentance. Jesus, who saw the heart, knew that the Pharisees were insincere in the charge which they brought against Him. They were attributing to Satan what they knew to be the work of God." Carr on Matt. xii. 32.

desperate state of sin<sup>1</sup>, into which they might fall. Now He would scarce have done this, if there was in their present state no hope that they could repent, no possibility of their being forgiven.

viii. Objections continued. Again the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews affirms

(a) As touching those who were once enlightened, and tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the age to come, and fell away², it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame (Heb. vi. 4—6).

Now here we have to notice

- (1) That the sin spoken of as "falling away" is not a lapse into moral guilt<sup>3</sup>, but a positive and continuous apostasy from the Christian faith<sup>4</sup>;
- (2) That the impossibility here asserted is not

2 "This brief clause bears the whole weight of the terrible contrast between the past state, with its many gracious particulars, and the lapse from it. All these experiences of grace—and all forfeited!" Vaughan in loc.

<sup>3</sup> Παραπεσόντας; "post tanta dona." Corn. a Lapide in loc. The term is a strong one. See Rom. xi. 11 where  $\pi l \pi \tau \omega$  as contrasted with  $\pi \tau \alpha l \omega$  implies an irreparable fall. "It is the final throwing away of grace, not any one sin of exceptional heinousness, which is the subject of all these passages." Vaughan in loc.

For the word  $\Phi \omega \tau \iota \sigma \theta \acute{e} \nu \tau as$  became in Christian usage a constant term for conversion to the Christian faith. Hence  $\Phi \omega \tau \iota \sigma \mu \acute{e} s$  became almost synonymous with Holy Baptism from the time of Justin Martyr downwards (Apol. i. 61, 65). The Syriac Versions give this sense here. Pesh. who have once descended to baptism; Hcl. who have once been baptized. Comp. Westcott in loc.

that of a single renewal, but of an indefinitely repeated renewal of those, who persist in turning their backs on the one appointed way of salvation, and in neglecting the ordained means of grace;

(β) In another passage, again, of the same Epistle the writer asserts that if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgement, and a fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversaries (Heb. x. 26, 27).

Here again applying the same rule of interpretation we observe - That the sin alluded to is not a sudden lapse, but a wilful and continuous persistence in a course of sin<sup>2</sup>;

- (2) That this continuous persistence in sin<sup>3</sup> is understood to follow a more advanced knowledge<sup>4</sup> than a simple acquaintance with the primary elements of the Faith;

1 "The distinction between the present and a orist tenses is conspicuous throughout the passage. The aorists φωτισθέντας, γευσαμένους, γενηθέντας, παραπεσόντας indicate single acts. The presents ἀνακαινίζειν, ἀνασταυροῦντας, παραδειγματίζοντας point not to single acts, but to a continued state of hardheartedness, revealing itself in successive acts and thus becoming habitual. There is an active continuous hostility implied in the souls of such men. The present participles bring out the moral cause of the impossibility which has been affirmed." Westcott in loc.

<sup>2</sup> "To sin 'Exovotws is to sin not under the constraining force of sudden temptation acting upon the weakness of the mortal nature, but (as Psalm xxv. 3 expresses it) without cause (διακενῆs LXX.), that is, by free choice and will." Vaughan in loc.

<sup>3</sup> Εκουσίως ἀμαρτανόντων ἡμῶν=if we wilfully persist in sin, voluntarie peccantibus nobis. Vulg. The present tense deserves all attention. Two distinct elements are indicated by the phrase employed, (1) the voluntariness, that is the realised consciousness, and (2) the habitual indulgence in the sin. Comp. Westcott in loc.

<sup>4</sup> Μετὰ τὸ λαβεῖν τὴν ἐπίγνωσιν τῆς ἀληθείας. Ἐπίγνωσις it is to be observed, not γνώσις. The knowledge received is treated as complete, and the word ἐπίγνωσις marks the great-

- That it is not said that for such there is no (3)more forgiveness possible, but that there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins1. The one true Sacrifice has been offered up once for all. He who by wilful and persistent sin cuts himself off from the communion of the Church, cuts himself off from that one Sacrifice, that one Source of forgiveness, and this cannot but end in a certain fearful expectation of judgment, and righteous retribution on the part of a holy God.
- (γ) Once more in the same Epistle we are told respecting Esau, who for one mess of meat2 sold his own birthright, that even when he afterward3 desired to inherit the blessing, he was rejected (for he found no place of repentance), though he sought it diligently with tears (Heb. xii. 16, 17);

Now here it is clear

That if the writer meant to assert that Esau earnestly sought to repent, but could not, then he is contradicting the whole tenour of the Scriptures and of the Gospel;

ness of the fall which is contemplated. Comp. Westcott in loc. On γνωσις and έπίγνωσις see The Introduction to the Creeds, p. 18 n.

The order of the words in the original is remarkable. Περὶ ἀμαρτιῶν stands prominently first, θυσία last; for sins there is left no sacrifice. "The sacrifice of Christ has been rejected; and there is no other sacrifice which can be effectual." "Non reservatur nobis ultra hostia pro peccato quæ pro nobis offeratur, sicut in veteri lege donatum est hostias sæpe offerre pro peccatis." Primasius quoted by Westcott in loc.

2 'Αντί βρώσεως μιας=for one mess of meat, Vulg. propter unam escam. For a single meal. It was not only for a transitory and material price, but that the smallest, he sold his own birthright, τὰ πρωτοτόκια ἐαυτοῦ. Comp. Gen. xxv. 32 sqq. Comp. Westcott in loc.

<sup>3</sup> Kal μετέπειτα. "Even after-wards. So long after, that he might have hoped that the early folly was forgotten and done with. The common chronology interposes more than 40 years between the two incidents." Vaughan in loc.

- That what Esau earnestly desired was a (2) reversal of the temporal consequences of his action, an undoing of the effects of what he had done, an obtaining of the blessing in spite of his selling the birthright. This, however, he could not obtain, though he sought it1 diligently with tears. The lost blessing could not be won again;
- (3) That the consideration of the forgiveness of his sin against God as distinct from the reversal of the temporal consequences2 of his sin, lies wholly outside the argument.

ix. Indefectibility of Grace. The second error condemned in the Article is the doctrine that the regenerate cannot fall away from Grace once given, and can no more sin as long as they live; in other words that Grace is indefectible. As regards this doctrine we have to notice

- (a) That the holy angels were not incapable of falling. They kept not their own estate or principality (Jude 6), but fell away and await the judgement of the Great Day (Jude 6);
- (B) That our Lord distinctly spoke of (a) the good seed becoming unfruitful (Matt. xiii. 22); (b) the salt losing its savour (Matt. v. 13); (c) the branch being cast forth from the vine (John Esau sought repentance and could not find it. What Esau sought with tears was the εὐλογία, and to it alone can αὐτὴν refer with any shadow of adherence to the history even if spiritualized into allegory. The simple explanation of the difficulty is that the words μετανοίας γάρ τόπον οὐχ εὖρεν are practically parenthetical to the main sentence." Vaughan in loc.

3 Γίνεται (Matt. xiii. 22) = resulteth

<sup>1</sup> The ἐκζητήσας αὐτήν must refer to the lost blessing, την εὐλογίαν, not the μετανοίας τόπος. He had sold the right of the firstborn, and yet, as if that were a trivial thing, he claimed to inherit the blessing which belonged to it.

- xv. 6), all which expressions indicate the possibility of a Christian's falling away from Grace once given;
- (γ) That S. Paul reminds the Corinthians of the awful warning supplied by the Israelitish nation of the possibility of falling from Grace, for they all enjoyed the highest possible privileges, but, instead of entering the Promised Land, were all, with the exception of two, overthrown in the wilderness (1 Cor. x. 1—12). He also distinctly contemplates the possibility of his becoming a castaway himself (1 Cor. ix. 27), and, later, in his Epistle to the Philippians speaks of himself as having by no means attained to perfection (Phil. iii. 12, 13);
- (δ) Lastly S. Peter, with the remembrance ever before him of his own terrible fall, exhorts the Christians of the Dispersion to give the more diligence to make their calling and election sure<sup>1</sup> (2 Pet. i. 10), and he says of those, who, after escaping the defilements of the world, again become entangled therein and overcome, that the last state has become with them worse than the first (2 Pet. ii. 20)<sup>2</sup>.
- xi. Conclusion. Thus the language of the Article harmonizes with the statements of Holy Scripture, and no less with those of the Prayer-Book. For (a) in the Baptismal Office we pray that the child to be admitted into both (comp. 2 Cor. vi. 1; Gal. ii. 21), and that effort was required to give them permanent validity. See Prof. Plumptre's note in loc.

Christ's Church "may ever remain in the number of God's faithful and elect children"; (b) in the Catechism the child is taught to pray unto God that he may continue in that state of salvation, into which he has been called; (c) in the Morning and Evening Prayer we beseech God "not to take His Holy Spirit from us"; (d) in the Collect for the thirteenth Sunday after Trinity we pray "that we may so faithfully serve God in this life, that we fail not finally to attain His heavenly promises"; and (e) in the Burial Office we beseech our "holy and merciful Saviour, our most worthy Judge eternal," that He will "suffer us not, at our last hour, for any pains of death, to fall from Him<sup>1</sup>."

<sup>1</sup> It is not intended to deny that there is such a thing as Final Perseverance; on the contrary, it is the Grace of Final Perseverance for which we pray in these and in similar petitions; what is denied is the Indefectibility of Grace, a doctrine which (a) theoretically ignores the fact that the whole course of this life is a state of probation, (b) practically has hindered the growth of moral conduct; "mater negligentiæ solet esse se-

curitas." The Calvinists admitted that, in a limited degree, Grace is defectible. At the Hampton Court Conference in 1604, an attempt was made to find a place in the Article for their view by the addition of the words "not totally, nor finally." Had such terms been included, the implication would not have been avoided that the Grace of Baptism necessitates the Grace of Final Perseverance.

ARTICLE XVII.

De Prædestinatione et Electione.

Prædestinatio ad uitam, est æternum Dei propositum, quo ante iacta mundi fundamenta, suo consilio, nobis quidem occulto, constanter decreuit, eos quos in Christo elegit ex hominum genere, à maledicto et exitio liberare, atque ut uasa in honorem efficta, per Christum ad æternam salutem adducere: Vnde qui tam præclaro Dei beneficio sunt donati, illi spiritu eius opportuno tempore operante, secundum propositum eius uocantur: uocationi per gratiam parent: iustificantur gratis: adoptantur in filios: vnigeniti Iesu Christi imagini efficiuntur conformes: in bonis operibus sanctè ambulant: et demum ex Dei misericordia pertingunt ad sempiternam fœlicitatem.

Ouemadmodum Prædestinationis et Electionis nostræ in Christo pia consideratio, dulcis, suauis et ineffabilis consolationis plena est verè pijs et his qui sentiunt in se uim spiritus CHRISTI, facta carnis et membra quæ adhuc sunt super terram mortificantem, animumque ad cœlestia et superna rapientem, tum quia fidem nostram de æterna salute consequenda per Christum plurimum stabilit atque confirmat, tum quia amorem nostrum in Deum uehementer accendit: ita hominibus curiosis, carnalibus, et spiritu Christi destitutis, ob oculos perpetuò versari Prædestinationis Dei 1571.

Of predestination and election.

Predestination to lyfe, is the euerlasting purpose of God, wherby (before the foundations of the world were layd) he hath constantly decreed by his councell secrete to vs, to deliuer from curse and damnation, those whom he hath chosen in Christe out of mankynde, and to bryng them by Christe to euerlastyng saluation, as vessels made to honour. Wherefore they which be indued with so excellent a benefite of God, be called according to Gods purpose by his spirite workyng in due season: they through grace obey the callyng: they be justified freely: they be made sonnes of God by adoption: they be made lyke the image of his onelye begotten sonne Jesus Christe: they walke religiously in good workes, and at length by Gods mercy, they attaine to euerlastyng felicitie.

As the godly consyderation of predestination, and our election in Christe. is full of sweete, pleasaunt, and vnspeakeable comfort to godly persons, and such as feele in themselves the working of the spirite of Christe. mortifying the workes of the fleshe. and their earthlye members, and drawing vp their mynde to hygh and heauenly thinges, aswell because it doth greatly establyshe and confirme their fayth of eternal saluation to be enioved through Christ, as because it doth feruently kindle their love towardes God: So, for curious and carnal persons, lacking the spirite of

Deinde promissiones diuinas sic amplecti oportet, ut nobis in sacris literis generaliter propositæ sunt: et Dei voluntas in nostris actionibus ea sequenda est, quam in uerbo Dei habemus disertè reuelatam.

Christe, to haue continually before their eyes the sentence of Gods predestination, is a most daungerous downefall, whereby the deuyll doth thrust them either into desperation, or into rechelesnesse of most vncleane liuing, no lesse perilous then despera-

Furthermore, we must recease Gods promises in such wyse, as they be generally set foorth to vs in holy scripture; and in our doynges, that wyl of God is to be followed, which we have expreslye declared vnto vs in the worde of God.

- i. Connection. The Seventeenth Article naturally follows the last, which dealt in its concluding clauses with the doctrines of Indefectible Grace and Final Perseverance. In the original draft of 1553 it was preceded by an Article, treating of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. This was withdrawn in 15631.
- ii. Source. The general wording of the Article is deemed to bear some resemblance to Luther's Preface to his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans2. The concluding paragraph, "we must receive God's promises in such wise as they are generally set forth to us in holy Scripture," is thought to reflect the language of Melancthon3.
- iii. Object. Its intention was to allay the angry and heated discussions respecting the doctrine of Predestination promoted throughout the country by the Calvinist and Anabaptist factions4. And while it commends in general terms one view of Predestination, it is careful at the same time to guard against Fatalism, into which "curious and carnal persons" were in danger of being betrayed by taking a one-sided view on this mysterious subject.

- iv. The Doctrine of Predestination has excited keen dispute at various epochs in the history of the Church. Men found themselves unable to reconcile the perfect power and knowledge of God with the freedom of the human will. In what sense, it was asked, are we to understand God's purposes for the salvation of mankind (1 Tim. ii. 4)1? Does the Gospel give us pledges of a salvation which is so universal as to be unconditional? Is this the meaning of the omnipotence of Divine Love? Will, thus, all men finally be saved? Again, if all men will not finally be saved, what of the lost? What has this omnipotent Love of God been doing with them<sup>2</sup>? Has it failed in their case because the human will is free and. therefore, the Divine purposes are conditional, or because it is not what we understand by true Love at all, but mere wanton caprice?
- v. The Answer of S. Augustine. In the early ages of the Church the question did not excite much controversy. It was generally felt that man must be assisted by Divine Grace<sup>3</sup>, if he is to do anything pleasing to God, and to attain to final salvation, and the idea that this Grace was not bestowed equally on all led to the further idea of an eternal decree regulating its bestowal. But there appears to have been no thought of an unconditional final Predestination; Grace not Glory was in view<sup>4</sup>. Later on S. Augustine of Hippo, pondering over the earlier experience of a time when the mercy of God "pursued him through his wild youth and restless manhood until it conquered him 'under the fig-tree at Milan,'" and awed by the contemplation of the Love1, which had rescued him from the path of sin, came to connect the Grace of God with an inscrutable and irresistible decree. This led to the conception of an Absolute Will, which out of the mass2 of souls, all alike deserving perdition, selected a minority to become vessels of Divine Mercy (vasa misericordia), and abandoned the majority as vessels of Divine Wrath (vasa iræ) without regard, in either case, to foreseen moral character3. It was an act of occult justice beyond human comprehension. No less was it an act of sovereign mercy that any man should be saved. A century later under Cæsarius, Archbishop of Arles, a Council was held at Orange within his province in A.D. 529, which laid it down, amongst other Articles, that according to the Catholic Faith, "all the baptized are capable, by Christ's aid and cooperation, if they choose to work faithfully, of fulfilling the conditions of eternal salvation." In express terms the Council denied a Predestination to evil. Those, it held, who do evil do it of their own free will4.

vi. The Answer of the School Authors. The controversy then for a time slumbered, till it was revived by Gottschalk, a monk of Orbais in the diocese of Soissons<sup>5</sup>.

Going far beyond even his favourite author S. Augustine, he maintained the most rigorous opinions upon the subject, and propounded a crude doctrine of deliberate and pretemporal Predestination to salvation and perdition, independent of prævisa merita, denying both the potential universality of Redemption and the freedom of the will. He was generally condemned<sup>1</sup>, and his teaching called forth the De Prædestinatione of Erigena in A.D. 851. The question divided the Schools. Alexander of Hales is distinguished as being one of the earliest to depart from the more rigid Augustinian view2. The teaching of S. Thomas Aquinas upon the subject, while definitely Augustinian, is marked by a sense both of the Divine justice and of human responsibility. With him, man is not merely foreordained. he is foreknown. The fruits of Grace depend upon the soil in which Grace is sown. There is no arbitrary ban, under which some men lie, while others escape it3. Moreover the human will is of account. It may be foreordained to a correspondence with Grace, even with the Grace of Final Perseverance, without any loss of freedom, so that. contingently, it gives effect to the Divine Predestination4. S. Thomas also contemplates an election to Grace as distinct from an election to Glory. Upon the whole, as we should expect, the Thomists and the Dominicans were Augustinian, while the Scotists and the Franciscans took the other side, and not infrequently laid themselves open to the charge of at least Semi-Pelagianism.

non præexigit diversitatem gratiæ, quia hoc electionem consequitur; sed præexigit diversitatem naturæ in divina cognitione, et sacit diversitatem gratiæ, sicut dispositio diversitatem natura facit." S. Thom. Aquin. Sum. i. 41, Quæst. i. Art. 2.

vii. The Answer of Calvin. At the period of the Reformation, Calvin¹, taking the teaching of S. Augustine, worked it out to its conclusions with cold logical precision. Predestination is absolute. There is no effectual calling except of such as are foreordained to be finally saved by the force of irresistible Grace. Thus he held like Gottschalk that God imparts his renewing Grace to such only as He chooses in His eternal counsel and purpose to save. All others, for whom this Grace is not designed, are appointed to eternal misery, and this is utterly irrespective of anything, good or bad, in them². This election proceeds entirely from the absolute, unconditional, and irresistible determination of the Divine Will².

viii. The Answer of Arminius. Another school, that of Arminius, held that God willed the salvation of all men, and proffered His renewing Grace to all men without distinction. But while He left men's will free, He vouch-safed His final salvation as the reward of those good deeds, nationis est certus, et tamen libertas arbitrii non tollitur, ex qua contingenter provenit prædestinationis effectus." S. Thom. Aquin. Sum. 1. 24, Art. 3.

<sup>1</sup> Born at Noyon, in Picardy, A.D. 1509, Calvin, on being forced to quit France, settled at Geneva, and there his system was widely disseminated, and gained a vast number of adherents. His "Institutes" were published in 1536. The great discussion, however, respecting Predestination at Geneva, and the publication of Calvin's book De Pradestinatione did not take place till 1552, the very year in which the Articles were put forth. Calvin died A.D. 1564.

of election, saying, "Talis electio sine causis videtur tyrannica." Laurence, Bampton Lectures, p. 414; Aubrey Moore's Reformation, p. 516.

4 James Harmensen was a native of Holland, and was born at Oudewater in A.D.1560. Afterstudying at the University of Leyden he went to Geneva, and under the teaching of Beza embraced the doctrine of Predestination in its most rigid form. Returning to Amsterdam in 1588, and being appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation, he was led to a more careful examination of the subject, and considerably modified his views. In 1604 he was made professor in the University of Leyden, and gained many converts to his opinions, which led to bitter controversy between him and his followers and their Calvinistic opponents. He died in 1600.

which He foresaw that men would do'. This teaching, certainly, implies a full recognition of human free will and is not inconsistent with what is known to us of the Divine attributes. On the other hand, it dogmatizes upon a point upon which the Catholic Church has made no authoritative statement.

ix. The Teaching of the Primitive Fathers. Going back to the earliest times of the Church we find that the Primitive Fathers, taking a practical view of the subject, identify the elect with the baptized, and hold that Predestination and Election are to Baptismal privileges, while the question whether a person is elected to life eternal and final glory can be known only to God Himself. They hold that as the Jews of old were all the chosen people of God, so now every baptized member of the Christian Church is one of God's elect. Thus:—

- (a) Clement of Rome writes to the Corinthians, "The Church of God which sojourneth in Rome to the Church of God which sojourneth in Corinth, to them which are called and sanctified by the will of God through our Lord Jesus Christ<sup>3</sup>;"
- (β) Ignatius addresses the Trallians as "elect and worthy of God, having peace in flesh and spirit through the Passion of Jesus Christ<sup>4</sup>;"

Hardwick, Middle Age, p. 163.

- (γ) So also Justin Martyr speaking of the Christian Church in opposition to the Jewish, says, "We are by no means a despicable people, nor a barbarous nation, like the Phrygians and the Carians, but God hath elected us, and hath manifested Himself to those who asked not for Him¹;"
- (δ) So also Irenæus writes, "the same God, who formerly elected the patriarchs, hath now elected us";"
- (ε) Similarly Clement of Alexandria in the third century says, "I call the Church the general assembly of the elect*," and he holds the Church to be an Assembly "which collects together by the will of God those already ordained, whom God hath predestinated*."

These quotations sufficiently show that the Primitive Fathers taking a practical view of the subject identified the elect with the baptized, and regarded the election to privilege as the one matter of practical concern.

x. The Analogy of the Jewish Church confirms this view. The whole Jewish nation were once the object of God's election. But for what purpose were they elected? Was it to an unfailing and infallible possession even of the Promised Land? Nay, of those who were delivered from Egyptian bondage, all but two perished before they ever reached it, and their carcases lay bleaching in the desert.

They were elected to great and glorious privileges. They were chosen to be a special people unto the Lord Himself, above all peoples that were upon the face of the earth (Deut. vii. 6)1. He could say to them by the mouth of Isaiah, Thou. Israel, My servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham My friend; thou whom I have taken hold of from the ends of the earth, and called thee from the corners thereof, and said unto thee, Thou art My servant, I have chosen thee and not cast thee away (Isai. xli. 8, 9). But why had God elected them? They were called to fulfil a high and solemn purpose in the Divine counsels, to preserve the doctrine of the Unity of God, to be the guardians of His Law, to keep alive the hope of the Messiah, and to set the example of a pattern people living in righteousness and true holiness. If there were any further election, as far as the Old Testament is concerned, it was one of the secret things hidden under the shadow of God's throne.

xi. Election in the New Testament. The Apostles apply to the members of the Christian Church precisely the same language as is used by Moses and the prophets respecting the Jewish nation. S. Paul scarcely begins any Epistle without addressing not a few but all the members of the Church to which he is writing, as "holy," or "called," or "elect." Knowing, brethren beloved of God, your election, he writes to the Thessalonians?. To all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints: Grace to you and peace3, he writes to the Romans (Rom. i. 7). He addresses, without particularising any special persons the saints at Corinth, at Ephesus at Philippi, at Colossæ4. Similarly S. Peter calls the members of the Church of the Dispersion, elect...according to the foreknowledge of God the Father:...a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession1 (1 Pet. i. 1, 2, ii. 9). Thus just as the prophets addressed the Jews so the Apostles address the members of the different Churches to whom they write. They speak of them as the chosen people of God; they impress upon them the privileges and blessings of their election; they urge upon them the realisation of their true position as members of Christ, and children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. But they do not speak of them or to them as elected to an infallible salvation, to an absolutely certain crown. They speak of them as having a conflict to maintain; and a race to run; they exhort them to quench not the Spirit Who is aiding them; to grieve Him not (1 Thess. v. 19) lest He wing His everlasting flight; they warn them to be steadfast and to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. ii. 12); they urge them to be sober unto prayer2 (1 Pet. iv. 7).

xii. The Teaching of the Article. The failure of the Article to satisfy the Calvinists is forcible evidence of its moderation<sup>3</sup>. It does not attempt to solve the problem express those who are finally selected to partake of the joys of heaven. Before that blessing can be theirs, they must, with faithful endeavour 'make their calling and election sure' (2 Pet. i. 10). The thing to which they have been elected, 'according to the foreknowledge of God,' is described by S. Peter as 'obedience and sprinkling of the Blood of Jesus Christ' (1 Pet. i. 2): that is to say, they are Christians. This is already theirs; and if it be rightly used, it is a pledge and an earnest of eternal salvation." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, pp. 347, 348, ed. 1889.

of Divine foreknowledge and human freedom; it uses no technical Predestinarian terms; it says nothing of reprobation, or of preterition, or of effectual calling, or of final perseverance; it sets no logical limitations to the promises of God.

- (i) Keeping close to the words of Holy Scripture, and especially to the teaching of S. Paul, it simply states the fact of Predestination in the Divine Mind, whereby God chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blemish before Him in love: having foreordained us unto adoption as sons through Fesus Christ unto Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will (Eph. i. 4, 5)1;
- (ii) Similarly, in strict keeping with the Epistle to the Romans, it affirms that whom God fore-knew<sup>2</sup>, He also foreordained<sup>3</sup> to be conformed

1 One of the best comments on this passage is supplied by the introductory address of S. Ignatius in his Epistle to this same Church of Ephesus: "Ignatius, who is also Theophorus, unto her which hath been blessed in greatness through the plenitude of God the Father; which hath been foreordained before the ages to be for ever unto abiding and unchangeable glory, united and elect in a true passion (ἡνωμένη και ἐκλελεγμένη ἐν πάθει  $\dot{\alpha}\lambda\eta\theta\iota\nu\hat{\omega}$ ), by the will of the Father and of Jesus Christ our God; even unto the Church which is in Ephesus [in Asia], worthy of all felicitation: abundant greeting in Christ Jesus and in blameless joy." Ignat. ad Eph. i. It is evident that this early Father here applies the words Election and Predestination—and that he supposed S. Paul to apply them—to the whole visible Church of God at Ephesus; to all those who were joined in the body of Christ by the Apostolic symbol of "one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism" (Eph. iv. 5). See Bp C. Wordsworth Comm. in loc.

<sup>2</sup> Προέγνω. The idea that God knows beforehand, that He possesses præscientia, prescience, is inseparable from our conception of Him as the "Everlasting Now." But the fact that He foreknows, that His mind rests beforehand upon a person with approval (Exod. xxxiii. 12, LXX., and Psalm i. 6), does not interfere with man's free agency. That God foreknows what we shall do no more destroys our free agency than our foreknowing, with accuracy proportionate to the reliability of our characters, how we shall act in any given case. Comp. Mill, Logic, ii. p. 422, ed. 1879.

to the image of His Son that He might be the firstborn among many brethren: and whom He foreordained, them He also called: and whom He called, them He also justified: and whom He justified, them He also glorified (Rom. viii. 29, 30);

- (iii) It then goes on to state, still in Biblical language, how the Grace of God leads those whom He calls by His Spirit<sup>2</sup>, to obey His calling; how He justifies them freely<sup>3</sup>, and adopts them as His sons; how He moves them to do good works, and at length leads them to everlasting felicity.
- (iv) After laying down these careful statements, the Article guards men against any abuse of the doctrine: for it says that
  - (α) While on the one hand the doctrine tends to comfort<sup>4</sup> "godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of this foreordaining is not a blind destiny, but an enabling condition.

1 The key to this language is the statement of verse 28. With them that love God all must be well. For consider their spiritual history. It is traceable far back into the eternity of God. Is it possible that He will fail them now? Is Glory for them a bare uncertainty? The whole passage is hortative and consolatory, rising in its conclusion to a retrospect from the state of final blessedness. See Bp Ch. Wordsworth in loc.

The weakest Christian may believe that he is no intruder within the sacred precincts, brought in by his own presumption or the mistaken kindness of friends. He is where God Himself has placed him, and had eternally determined to place Him." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, p. 351, ed. 1889.

- (v) The Article concludes with two important Canons of interpretation of Holy Scripture in reference to this mysterious subject:
  - (a) "We must receive God's promises in such

<sup>5</sup> This is the English rendering of the Latin "perniciosam impurissimæ vitæ securitatem." The language suggests the terrible moral disasters which history shows to have followed upon a false view of God's character and, consequently, of His dealings with the souls of men. It is no mere probability of which the Article speaks. The sectaries of that and of the following century fully revealed the extent of the danger. For the sentiment expressed in the clause compare the words of Luther, Postill. Domest. p. 58, "E contra ii, qui sentiunt Dei voluntatem non esse, ut omnes salventur, aut in desperationem aut in securissimam impietatem dissolvantur." See Hallam, Constit. wise as they be generally," or universally, "set forth in holy Scripture;"

(β) "In our doings that Will of God is to be followed, which we have expressly declared to us in the Word of God."

xiii. The Universality of Redemption. In opposition to the Calvinistic doctrine of reprobation, which they tacitly ignore, the Articles hold with great clearness and certainty the universality of redemption through Christ? They lay it down in Article ii. that Christ "truly suffered ... to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men;" in Article vii. that "everlasting life is offered to Mankind by Christs;" in Article xv. that Christ "came to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world4"; in Article xxxi. that the offering of Christ is "that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual<sup>5</sup>." Similarly in the Baptismal Service it is asserted that the goodwill of our heavenly Father flows forth towards all, who are brought to His holy Baptism, that He favourably receives them, and embraces them with the arms of His mercy, gives unto them the blessing of eternal

Gottschalk. In the early stages of their history the Lutherans possibly were doubtful upon the point, but eventually Melancthon took the decided view that God wills the salvation of all men, and that therefore Christ died for all men. See Laurence, Bampton Lectures, pp. 248 ff. and 414.

life, and makes them partakers of His everlasting kingdom. Moreover the baptized are said to be "received into the number of the children of God, and made heirs of everlasting life2," and the child is taught in the Church Catechism to say that in Baptism it was made "a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven." On any principle of reprobation by the unknown and inscrutable decree of God such language would be quite untrue. It is assumed in the Baptismal Offices that every Baptized person is elect.

- xiv. The Rules of Interpretation which close the Article are designed to guard men against erroneous views on the subject of personal and individual election. They state that
  - (a) "We must receive God's promises in such wise, as they be generally set forth to us in holy Scripture." This clause was preceded in 1553 by the words, "although the Decrees of predestination are unknown unto us4." The secret

Every baptized Christian has been chosen out of the world to be placed in the Church, in order that he may be brought by Christ to everlasting salvation, as a vessel made to honour. He may forfeit the blessing afterwards, but it has been freely bestowed upon him. "Salvation, if attained, will be wholly due to the grace of God, which first chooses the elect soul to the blessings of the Baptismal covenant, and afterwards endues it with power to live the life of faith." Bp Browne

He made a general proclamation, saying, 'Whosoever believeth in Me hath everlasting life!'... Also consider what Christ saith with His own mouth; 'Come to Me, all ye that labour, and are laden, and I will ease you.' Mark here He saith, 'Come all ye'; wherefore then should any man despair to shut himself from these promises of Christ, which be general, and pertain to the whole world?" Serm., p. 182, Ed.

decrees of God respecting the ultimate destiny of individuals are and must be hidden from us1. But His promises are to be received<sup>2</sup> as they apply to all men, not to particular persons3. Expressions, which, according to their original intention, apply to all men generally, are not to be narrowed down to certain favourites previously ordained to bliss, but are to be regarded as applicable to all who have been baptized into the Church. And again men are not to indulge every evil propensity of their nature, under pretence of being overruled by a secret will of Heaven which they can neither promote nor resist4:

"In our doings, that Will of God is to be  $(\beta)$ followed, which we have expressly declared to us in the Word of God." His revealed will is that all men shall be saved, and come unto a full \ knowledge of the truth (I Tim. ii. 4); that whosoever believeth on the Son of God should not perish, but have everlasting life (John iii. 16);

Nec debemus de voluntate Dei aliter judicare, quam juxta verbum revelatum...Nos igitur simpliciter interpretamur hanc sententiam universaliter, 'Deus vult omnes homines salvos fieri,' scilicet, quod ad ipsius voluntatem attinet."

<sup>2</sup> Archbishop Laurence paraphrases the clause in the Article thus: " " We must receive' (embrace, amplecti) 'the promises of God, in such wise as they are generally set forth to us in holy Scripture,' or as they are proposed to us all in Scripture, because all, as Christians, are predestined to salva-tion." Bampton Lectures, Appendix,

p. 375.
"The Christian sees, represented in the concrete fact of his Baptism, the eternal and unchangeable attitude of God towards him. His own personality, now passing through the vicissitudes of an earthly discipline, is linked to the stability of the life of God." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, pp. 332 sq., ed. 1888; comp. Bp Forbes On the Articles, p. 254.

that the Gospel should be preached to every creature (Mk. xvi. 15). This is His Will as "expressly declared to us." This we have to follow. We are to extend the privileges, of which we have been made partakers, to as many as we can reach. For the elect people of God in this Dispensation, as well as in that which preceded it, are not elected only for their own advantage, but for the advantage of all the members of the human family.

xv. Ecclesiastical Election. The Article says nothing upon this subject. It does not suggest either that some men are not predestinated to the Grace of Baptism, or that those who die unbaptized are finally separated from the Church. It sets no limit to the uncovenanted mercies of God. The tenor of Holy Scripture would lead us to believe that there is no arbitrary and unconditional election to the Covenant, but that Baptismal Grace is a reward for the use of First Grace<sup>2</sup>. Yet, if Sufficient Grace for final salvation be granted to all men and made effectual or not according to their correspondence therewith, it is not for us to define exactly when or how in every case this blessed result may be achieved.

The Tridentine position as to Predestination is very similar to that of the Article. The whole question Predestination is very similar to that of the Article. The whole question was hotly disputed at the Council on the part both of Thomists and of Scotists. See Harold Browne, Articles, p. 262.

They also are to be had accursed, that presume to say, that every man shal be saued by the lawe or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his lyfe accordyng to that lawe, and the light of nature. For holy scripture doth set out vnto vs onely the name of Jesus Christe, whereby men must be saued.

- i. Connection. But if all deliverance, all everlasting salvation, is to be referred to the secret counsel of God as wrought out by the all-perfect sacrifice of His Blessed Son, can they be right, who hold that as long as men are sincere "in following out their own systems, their deliberate rejection of the Saviour of the world will prove no obstacle to their salvation¹?" It is with this theory of the rationalistic school of Anabaptists that the Eighteenth Article is concerned.
- ii. Title. The Latin title of this Article, while it was the same in 1553 and 1563, as given above, became in 1571, "De speranda æterna Salute tantum in Nomine Christi."

quam homines professi fuerint, salutem illis esse sperandam, si tantum ad innocentiam et integritatem vitæ pro viribus enitantur juxta lumen, quod illis prælucet a natura infusum." The original English, however, gave a literal translation of the Latin, "We must trust to obtain eternal Salvation only by the name of Christ1."

- iii. Language. The opening of the Article presents a slight difficulty by the occurrence of the word "also." "They also are to be had accursed?" The explanation seems to be that reference is here made to the closing words of the Sixteenth Article, "And therefore they are to be condemned." The present Article takes up the thread of the language there used, as though there were no break in the continuity of the two Articles.
- iv. The Object of the Article is to protest against the contention that there is no objective standard of character, which alone is worthy for its own sake of being the aim of all human effort, and which is necessarily associated with a special creed to be professed<sup>3</sup> and a special discipline to be fulfilled4. To maintain such a view is to deny Christian first principles5.

v. Analysis. The Article consists of two parts:-

(i) A proposition which is condemned:

1553. The "et" is retained in two MSS. of the Latin draft of 1563. In 1553 the English Version ran, "They also are to be had accursed, and ab-horred." The latter word was dropped in 1563. By being "accursed" is meant that they are to be debarred from the privileges of the Church or excommunicated so long as they persist in their error.

3 The notion is based upon the fallacy that belief is an act or habit of the intellect merely, the intellect in vacuo. But, to begin with, there is no such thing as the intellect in vacuo, and, next, belief is essentially moral, an act or habit of the moral will. Since will is "the expression of the man as he is," belief is very reasonably to be defined in the same terms. See Caird, Evolution of Religion, i. p. 30; Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 158.

4 It is the spirit that breathes in the well-known lines of Pope:

"For creeds and forms let senseless bigots fight,

He can't be wrong, whose life is in the right."

<sup>5</sup> "It is the one spiritual sin, which the Church of England anathematizes, because it finds its logical basis in the abnegation of all objective truth whatsoever." Bp Forbes On the Articles. p. 259.

That every man may owe his eternal salvation to "the Law or Sect which he professeth":

(ii) The reason of this condemnation:

"For holy Scripture doth set out2 unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved."

vi. The View of the Article. The Article contemplates a state in which a man rejects the offer of Salvation in Christ, when there can be no plea of invincible ignorance or of temperamental inability, a state, that is to say, of sinning against light. It does not deny the high value of a life lived in faithful conformity to the best that a man knows. Such a life of loving obedience wins the reward of true guidance3. But such a life is not outside the influence of Christ. Every act of such a life is prompted by the Spirit of Christ, and reflects, at least in some degree, the character of Christ. To hold this view is not to weaken the spring of Missionary enterprise. Every Missionary is, more or less, in the hopeful position of S. Paul at Athens, proclaiming the revealed truth concerning a God already worshipped, albeit in much ignorance.

1 Secta, from seco = to cut, denotes (i) A trodden or beaten path; (ii) a way or mode of conduct or procedure; (iii) a philosophical school or sect. Comp. Quintil. v. 7, 35, "Inter Stoicos et Epicuri sectam secutos pugna perpetua. est"; Tac. Hist. iv. 40, "Demetrio Cynicam sectam professo."

literæ tantum Jesu Christi nomen prædicent." Prædicare, to be carefully distinguished from prædicere, = (i) to distinguished from prædicere, = (i) to cry in public, to proclaim; Plaut. Bacch. iv. 7. 17, "Præco prædicat;" Cic. 2 Verr. iii. 16, 40, "Si palam præco prædicasset;" (ii) to make known, or publicly declare, state, or affirm. Comp. Ter. Andr. iii. 1. 7, "Si quidem hæc vera prædicat;" Cæsar, Bell. Gall. iv. 34, "Barbari paucitatem nostrorum militum suis prædicaverunt." For "set out" = to proclaim or publish. comp. Cooper's Thesaurus (1565), "Edo, to utter or put forth: to publish or sette abroade"; "to sette out in writing"; Lord Bacon, "I will use no other authority than that excellent proclamation set out by the king in the first year of his reign and annexed before the Book of Common Prayer;" Winthrop, Hist. New England, i. 264, "The other Minister also set out an answer to his sermon, confuting the same by many strong arguments."

See Ward, Ideal of a Christian Church, pp. 510 ff., for the principle of "true guidance in return for loving obedience," which Carlyle called a "prime need of man."

vii. The Teaching of Scripture may be considered as (a) Indirect: The Mosaic Law was a detailed revelation of the Divine Will. Standing upon a plane of its own, if any "Law or Sect" could of itself avail a man unto salvation, Judaism might well have done so¹. Yet it served to reveal its own inability. For the Law made nothing perfect (Heb. vii. 19). Privilege did but increase responsibility (Rom.ii. 25). There is no obedience otherwise than by Grace². The revelation of duty is one thing; the fulfilment of duty is another.

(b) Direct:

- (i) Our Lord says
  - (a) He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life<sup>3</sup>; but he that obeyeth not<sup>4</sup> the Son shall not see life (John iii. 36);

vii. Conclusion. These explicit statements bear out the words of the Article. Without denying that the power of our Lord's Incarnation and Passion may extend to many who have not heard His Name, it asserts that for those who have heard it there is salvation in none other. It affirms the principle expressed in our Lord's words, If ye were blind, ye would have no sin; but now ye say, We see: your sin remaineth (John ix. 41). On the ultimate condition of many of the heathen world it pronounces no opinion. It simply declares that, if a man is saved at all, his salvation must be due not to his holding the doctrines of any particular school or the tenets of any special sect, but to the One Redeemer of the Universe, Who was and is alone for every child of man at once the Way, and the Truth. and the Life2. What the Article denies is this, that a man's law or sect will of itself be sufficient for his salvation3.

<sup>8</sup> It would have been a serious difficulty if the Article had said that a man may not be saved in his sect: what it does deny is that a man "shall be saved by the Law or Sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that Law and the light of Nature."
The Latin ("in Lege aut secta") of 1563 may fairly be interpreted by the English of 1571. "In Acts iv. 12 έν φ, translated in the Latin Article in quo, is rendered in the English whereby. The meaning is obviously admissible that a man may be saved in an imperfect religion by God's mercy and Christ's merits, though not in virtue of his being a faithful member of that sect." ## GROUP IV.

ARTICLES XIX.—XXXIV.

The Articles in this group deal with men as Members of the Church.

- (a) They define the characteristic marks of the visible Church, and while acknowledging the infallibility of the Church as a whole, they deny the infallibility of any particular branch of it (Art. xix.);
- (β) They next deal with (i) the authority of the Church and the limitations thereto (Art. xx.); with (ii) general Councils as the voice of the Church (Art. xxi.); and with (iii) certain doctrines sanctioned by Councils claiming to be general (Art. xxii.);
- (γ) They then pass on to treat (i) of the Ministers of the Church, their call and mission (Art. xxiii.), and the language proper to their ministrations (Art. xxiv.); (ii) of the Sacraments of the Church, first generally (Arts. xxv. and xxvi.), and then specially, of Holy Baptism (Art. xxvii.), and of the Holy Eucharist (Arts. xxviii. and xxix.), which is to be administered to the laity in Both Kinds (Art. xxx.);
- (d) They next deal (i) with the relation of the Sacraments to the one sacrifice of Christ upon the Cross (Art. xxxi.); (ii) with the question of clerical celibacy (Art. xxxii.), with the power of excommunication (Art. xxxiii.), and with the right of particular Churches to accept, in things indifferent, local usages (Art. xxxiv.).

ARTICLE XIX.

De Ecclesia.

Ecclesia Christi uisibilis est cœtus fidelium, in quo uerbum Dei purum prædicatur, et sacramenta, quoad ea quæ necessario exiguntur, iuxta Christi institutum rectè administrantur. Sicut errauit ecclesia Hierosolymitana, Alexandrina et Antiochena: ita et errauit Ecclesia Romana, non solùm quoad agenda et cæremoniarum ritus, uerum in hijs etiam quæ credenda sunt.

Of the Church.

The visible Church of Christe, is a congregation of faythfull men, in the which the pure worde of God is preached, and the Sacramentes be duely ministred, accordyng to Christes ordinaunce in all those thynges that of necessitie are requisite to the same.

As the Church of Hierusalem, Alexandria, and Antioche haue erred: so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their liuing and maner of ceremonies, but also in matters of fayth.

- i. Connection. The transition from the Third to the Fourth Group of the Articles is a natural one. After declaring that our everlasting salvation is to be referred solely to the unmerited mercy of God, and that He has revealed only One Person, in union with Whom is pledged to us deliverance from the power and guilt of sin, we are led to consider the subject of the Church, which is His Mystical Body, and as members of which we are under the influence of the Grace which is its vital force.
- ii. Title. The Title of Article xix. has remained the same since the first draft in 1553. In that draft it was preceded by another, the old xixth, the title of which was, "All men are bound to keep the moral commandments of the Law1." The greater part of this Article has been incorporated with the present Seventh Article.

iii. The Object of the Article is a twofold one:-

- To give a definition of what constitutes a visible branch of the Universal or Catholic Church:
- To refute the doctrine persistently urged in (ii) many quarters as to the infallibility and inerrancy of one particular portion of it, viz., the Church of Rome<sup>2</sup>.
- iv. Source. The Article is based on the Seventh Article of the Augsburg Confession, the language of which was with some considerable modification introduced into the Thirteen Articles of 1538. It also resembles very nearly the language of the Institution of a Christian Man and similar formularies.
- v. The word Church is represented in the original of the New Testament by the Greek Ἐκκλησία<sup>3</sup>. This term, which originally denoted an assembly of persons at Athens called out by the voice of a herald for the purpose of legislation, was used in the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament to describe the entire assembly or congre-

This portion of the Articles finds a parallel in the Reformatio Legum, where we read, "Etiam illorum insania legum vinculis est constringenda, qui Romanam ecclesiam in hujusmodi petra fundatam esse existimant, ut nec erraverit, nec errare possit; cum et multi possint ejus errores ex superiore majorum memoria repeti, et etiam ex hac nostra proferri, partim in his quibus vita nostra debet informari, partim etiam in his quibus fides debet institui." De Hæresibus, c. 21, quoted in Hardwick, Hist. Art. p. 387, ed. 1859.

On the etymology of the English word Church, see Introduction to the Creeds, p. 218, n. 2, and Appendix

<sup>1</sup> It had reference to the teaching of a branch of the Anabaptists, who "by putting forth the plea of preternatural illumination, made themselves superior to the moral law, and circulated opinions respecting it 'most evidently repugnant to the Holy Scripture.'" gation of the Israelites1. The word was subsequently adopted by our Lord to describe the great Society2, which He came on earth to found, and into which He bade His Apostles invite members not from one nation only, namely, the Jewish, but from the whole world.

- vi. The Church Visible. It is remarked in the Fifth of the Thirteen Articles of 1538 that the word "Ecclesia," Church, has two significations in Holy Scripture:-
  - First it denotes the congregation of all saints and true believers, who truly believe in Christ their Head, and are sanctified by His Spirit. "This," it says, "is the living and truly holy mystical Body of Christ, but it is known to God alone, Who alone seeth the hearts of men";
  - (β) Secondly it denotes "the congregation of all men, who have been baptized in Christ, and have not openly denied Christ, or been justly and by His word excommunicated3."

As a matter of fact these are but two necessary aspects of the one Church4. The expression "Body of Christ" used of the Church by S. Paul indicates the relation existing between the Church and the Incarnation, of which it is, in Comp. Deut. xxxi. 30; 3 Kings viii. 14, LXX.; 1 Chron. xiii. 2; xxix. 20, LXX. See also Acts vii. 38.

It is used by Him for the first time on the occasion of S. Peter's memorable confession, Matt. xvi. 18, and again, Matt. xviii. 17.

3 "Ecclesia præter alias acceptiones in scripturis duas habet præcipuas; unam, qua Ecclesia accipitur pro con-gregatione omnium sanctorum et vere fidelium, qui Christo capiti vere credunt, et sanctificantur Spiritu ejus. Hæc autem vivum est et vere sanctum Christi corpus mysticum, sed soli Deo cognitum, qui hominum corda Altera acceptio est solus intuetur. qua Ecclesia accipitur pro congrega-tione omnium hominum qui baptizati sunt in Christo et non palam abnegarunt Christum, nec justè et per ejus verbum sunt excommunicati." Hardwick, Hist. Art. p. 263, ed. 1850.

a sense, the extension. The Incarnation explains the Church. Our Lord's own language always points to the Church as being a body with a definite organization, a mixed character<sup>1</sup>, a human structure and a spiritual destiny<sup>2</sup>. The expressions "House of God," "Household of God," "Household of Faith," all indicate the same truth, and suggest a community in the world but not of the world.

vii. Analysis. The Catholic Church, wherever found, has the characteristic of being "A congregation of faithful men4, in which

- The pure Word of God is preached, and
- (β) The Sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same6."

1 "It is certain that the Article confines itself to the consideration of the visible Church, and gives us no authoritative statement concerning the invisible Church." Bp Browne, Articles, p. 453.

Day.

3 We find the word "Church" applied in the Scriptures, sometimes (i) to the whole collective body of Christians scattered throughout the world (Acts xx. 28; 1 Cor. x. 32; Eph. v. 23); sometimes (ii) to a community of Christians in a particular town or country, as Jerusalem (Acts viii. 1), Antioch (Acts xiii. 1), Ephesus (Acts xx. 17), Corinth (1 Cor. i. 2); sometimes (iii) to a single body of Christians meeting or living in a private house, as that of Priscilla and Aquila (Rom. xvi. 5), that of Nymphas (Col. iv. 15), that of Philemon (Phil.

4 Fidelium. Fidelis here does not denote, as in Classical Latin, trusty, faithful men (comp. Livy xxii. 37, 4, "boni fidelesque socii"), but men professing faith, i.e. in our Lord Jesus Christ. It corresponds to such expressions as we find in Acts ii. 44, πάντες δὲ οἱ πιστεύοντες ήσαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό: iv. 32, πλήθους τῶν πιστεύσαντων: χίχ. 2, έλάβετε πιστεύσαντες: χίχ. 18, πολλοί τε τών πεπιστευκότων.

<sup>6</sup> That the Article does not define the Catholic or Universal Church, but rather indicates certain conditions necessary in order to constitute any given National Church a portion of the Universal Church, is clear from (a) the use of the word "Church" in the context as applied to National Churches,  $(\beta)$  the implied reference to some canonical authority supreme in respect alike of a "Norma Prædicationis," and of the administration of the Sacraments.

- viii. The Church a Visible Society. That the Church would form a visible company or Society is the uniform teaching of prophecy and of our Lord Himself. Thus
  - (i) (α) Isaiah says, It shall come to pass in the latter days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it (Isai. ii. 2);
    - (β) Again, Daniel prophesies, The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, nor shall the sovereignty thereof be left to another people; but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever (Dan. ii. 44).
  - (ii) Again, our Lord speaks of the Society He was about to establish as a kingdom visible as any earthly kingdom, and He compares it to
    - (a) A field in which good seed and bad grow together until the harvest (Matt. xiii. 24—30);
    - (β) A net enclosing good and bad fish, which are not separated till the net is drawn ashore (Matt. xiii. 47—50);
    - (γ) A marriage-feast, where all the guests are not provided with wedding-garments (Matt. xxii. I—I4).

All these passages indicate that the Church, wherever found, is not merely a spiritual and mystical communion, but a visible body<sup>1</sup> of professed believers in the Gospel which Christ proclaimed.

ix. The First Mark, according to the Article, of such a visible body or society is that in it "the pure Word of God is preached." With this Scripture agrees. For our Lord promised the Apostles that when the Spirit of truth was come. He would guide them into all the truth' (John xvi. 13), and He bade them go...and make disciples of all the nations...teaching them to observe all things whatsoever He had commanded them (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). Hence S. Paul recognises it as the primary part of his Apostolic mission to preach the Gospel (I Cor. i. 17); he sternly rebukes any who dared to preach any Gospel other than that which they had received (Gal. i. 9); and he affirms that the Church is the pillar and ground of the truth2 (I Tim. iii. 15). Now we may believe that in the Church "the pure3 word of God is preached" wherever the main doctrines contained in the Holy Scriptures and the Creeds are taught. Thus the Church justifies her title to be an Ecclesia docens when she communicates to her children the truths which God has revealed respecting alike the Person, Nature, and Work of our Lord, and the destinies of Creation; when "she impresses on the intellects of men the true doctrine of Christ-by oral instruction, by the development of a school of theology, by symbolical and suggestive rites, by catechetical teaching, by preserving and interpreting Holy Writ4." For not merely is the abiding conviction of these truths important as regards the leading a holy life, and the attainment of salvation hereafter, but their acceptance belongs to that supernatural life, which, begun on earth, receives its fulness in the eternal world that is to come.

x. The Second Mark of a Church visible is that therein "the Sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all things that of necessity are requisite to the same." For the Sacraments are essential to the existence of the Church. They are the ordained means whereby the Grace proceeding from Christ the Head and vitalizing the Church His Body is dispensed to its individual members1. This is only analogous to what had already been recognised under the Jewish Dispensation. God declared certain sacramental rites to be essential to the Old Covenant, into which by birth the Tew entered. Neglect of Circumcision or of the Passover involved excommunication from the people of Israel (Gen. xvii. 14; Exod. xii. 15). Hence, when our Lord founded His Church, He appointed Sacraments to take the place of the rites of Judaism, and principally (i) Baptism<sup>2</sup>, for the initiation of the adult or the child into the Church<sup>3</sup>, and (ii) the Holy Eucharist, for maintaining the communion thus begun between Himself and the members of His mystical Body (Matt. xxviii. 19; xxvi. 26-29). The administration of the Sacraments, under due conditions, is

2 "We receive Christ Jesus in baptism once as the first beginner, in the Eucharist often, as being by contine degrees the finisher of our life.... Each sacrament having both that which is general or common, and that also which is peculiar unto itself, we may hereby gather that the participation of Christ which properly belongeth to any one sacrament is not otherwise to be obtained but by the Sacrament whereunto it is proper." Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v.

2 "We receive Christ Jesus in baptime of the saving and the saving and the saving are the saving and the saving are the saving and the saving are the saving a as essential to the existence of the Christian Church as Circumcision and the observance of the Passover were to that of the Jewish Church, and such administration was the custom of the Apostles and those who succeeded them from the earliest times.

- xi. Due Administration. The term "duly<sup>2</sup>" is explained to mean that there are required
  - (α) Not only the right matter and form, as in Baptism the element of water and the Name of the Trinity³, and as in the Holy Eucharist bread and wine and our Lord's own words and actions⁴,
  - (β) But also the proper Minister, validly ordained and regularly commissioned,
  - (γ) And "the discipline of Christ," which, although it be somewhat dormant, is yet part of the constitution of the Church and is expressly referred to in the Commination, in the Ordinal, and in the Order of Holy Communion.

xii. The Second Part of the Article deals with the exclusive claim of one portion of the Church, viz. the Roman, to Divine protection against error in the definition of faith and morals. Here the Article does not merely take up a polemical position, it treats the question historidefinite words. There must be the proper materies and the proper forma. As regards the minister of this Sacrament the Church holds, as laid down in A.D. 1439 at the Council of Florence, that "in casu necessitatis licere laico, seu viro, seu feminae, seu Christiano, seu pagano baptizare, modo adsint materia, forma et intentio debita." Bellarm. Opera, De Sacr. Bapt. i. 7.

Bellarm. Opera, De Sacr. Bapt. i. 7.

cally also. Instead of barely stating that the Roman Church has erred, it declares that freedom from error did not distinguish certain even of the most ancient Churches of the East. It mentions the Churches of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch, before it speaks of Rome at all. It selects these Churches, because the Church of Jerusalem was in historical order the mother Church of Christendom; because Alexandria and Antioch were always recognized as standing in the first rank amongst the primitive Churches and being the most distinguished of those founded by Apostles or Apostolic men, and were in this respect on a par with the Church of Rome. None of these Churches has been immune from error any more than those spoken of in the Apocalypse of S. John<sup>1</sup>.

xiii. Points of Error. The Article does not distinctly state what are the errors to which allusion is made<sup>2</sup>. It simply states that as the Patriarchates of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria have erred, so the Church of Rome hath erred in mode of life, ceremonial, and matters of faith, and therefore cannot claim immunity any more than these Patriarchates. The term "living" probably alludes to the low moral tone and the corruptions which had crept into the Papal Curia in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries; the "manner of ceremonies" to the denial of the chalice to the laity, and the superstitious veneration of relics and images; and the "matters of of Laodicea with being neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm, and deserving to be spewed out of the mouth of her Lord (Rev. iii. 16).

In a Article only speaks in general terms. It is sufficient for its purpose to state, as an historical fact, that each of these Churches has from time to time been so injected by error as to vitiate any exclusive claim on its part to Divine protection.

faith1" to certain tenets which, during the Middle Ages. had become matters of pious belief in the Western Church. and which were in due course embodied in the Tridentine Catechism. But whatever be the object of the Article. whether to state that the corruptions which had crept in were the ground of the need of a Reformation, or to protest against the claim to infallibility by itself on the part of the Roman Church, in neither case is it denied that the Church Universal is Divinely protected against error<sup>2</sup>. The fact that practical corruptions had crept in was virtually owned in the Roman Church by the attempts at reform, which had been instituted again and again, but, until the Council of Trent, without much effect.

xiv. The Notes of the Church, as expressed in the Nicene Creed, are Unity, Holiness, Catholicity and Apostolicity. The first two may be viewed in two aspects. The Unity of the Church is objective and necessary in that the Church is the Mystical Body of Christ; it is subjective and contingent in that it may be violated by human perverseness in heresy and in schism. The same great fact of the Church's relation to its Divine Head constitutes its objective and necessary Holiness; and again, its Holiness is subjective and contingent as being a state of individuals liable to moral lapse. Concerning the Catholicity and Apostolicity of the Church the Article has said something. We may add that the Church is Catholic, as being a corporate body entrusted with a mission to all mankind; that it is Apostolic, as having been built, as regards its constitution, its faith and its morals, upon the conduct and teaching of the Apostles.

in them. To reject these would involve heresy and not merely error.

Wherefore, although the Churche be a witnesse and a keeper of holy writ: yet, as it ought not to decree any thing agaynst the same, so besides the same, ought it not to enforce any thing to be beleued for necessitie of saluation.

- i. Connection. Having dealt with the marks distinguishing a Branch of the Church visible, the Twentieth Article proceeds to deal with the authority of the Church in matters of ritual or ceremony, and also in controversies of faith.
- ii. Title and Language. Though the Title of the Article has never been altered, the language has undergone considerable change since the first draft in 1553. As then drawn up, it lacked the first clause altogether, and began with the words, "It is not lawful for the Church, to ordain anything, that is contrary to God's word written." The first clause was lacking not only in the first draft of 1553, but also in the first draft of the Elizabethan Articles of

iii. The First Clause. In the reign of Charles I. the controversy respecting the first clause assumed serious proportions. One of the charges brought by the Puritans against Archbishop Laud was that he had inserted it on his own account, and in self-defence he was obliged to bring forward an attested copy of the original draft from the records of Canterbury, which had long existed in the archives of S. Paul's Cathedral, and which records afterwards perished in the Great Fire of London in 16662. The Parker MSS., however, though of great authority, do not present us with the final draft of the Thirty-nine Articles, but with an earlier draft while they were in process of completion, and before the royal assent was given. Before that assent was accorded this clause was added, and was taken by Archbishop Parker from the Confession of Würtemberg, whence, as we have seen, most

The clause "is found (1) in an early Latin draft of the Articles, among the Elizabethan State Papers, where it was inserted by the same hand, after the draft itself was made, so as to fill exactly one line. (2) In the Latin Edition of Reynold Wolfe, 1563, as expressly authorised by the Queen. (3) In two or more English editions of Jugge and Cawood in 1571. 2 "The testimony of that record was produced upon the trial of archbishop Laud, in the most open and explicit manner, at a time when it was perfectly accessible to his accusers, or rather was in the hands of his infuriated enemies, and yet 'not one of them ever ventured to question the truth of the assertions, or attempted to invalidate the proof on which his defence had rested.'" Hardwick, pp. 146 sq., quoting British Critic, 1829, p. 96. Heylin writes, "Having occasion to consult the records of Convocation, I found this controverted clause, verbatim, in these following words; 'Habet ecclesia ritus statuendi jus et in fidei controversiis authoritatem.'" Examen Historicum, pp. 144, 145. The language of this controver'ed clause is analogous to that employed by the Würtemberg theologians, "Credimus et confitemur quod...hæc Ecclesia habeat jus judicandi de omnibus doctrinis." De Ecclesia.

iv. The Object of the Article is twofold:-

- (1) To check the waywardness of the Anabaptists, who in their zeal against ritual went so far as to deny that the Church had any authority whatsoever in matters of ceremonial<sup>1</sup>;
- (2) To discountenance extravagant notions as to the authority of the Church held by the extreme Mediæval School.
- v. Analysis. In its present shape the Article affirms three points:—
  - (α) That "the Church hath power to decree Rites or Ceremonies<sup>2</sup>";
  - (β) That she hath "authority in Controversies of Faith";
  - (γ) That she is "a witness and a keeper of holy Writ."

But this authority is limited by two conditions:-

- (I) The Church must not "ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written";
- (2) She must not "enforce anything to be believed for necessity of Salvation" besides the Word written.

vi. The First Point. When the Article lays it down that "the Church hath power to decree Rites or Ceremonies," it does not of course refer to anything which admittedly affects the validity of the Sacraments. Not that the

Church has had no voice in deciding what does and what does not belong to the esse of the Sacraments, but that such points are regarded as once for all and finally settled; they belong, as it were, to the very bedrock of the Church. But short of this there are other concerns with regard to which we may consider

- (a) The authority of the Church Universal;
- (β) The authority of local Churches.
- (a) If, as may be shown, the Church Universal has authority to define the symbolical expression of matters of faith, à fortiori it has authority to regulate and to enforce matters of external order and of discipline, some of them permanently, according to principle, others of them temporarily, according to expediency. Probably it will always be a more or less open question as to the points which fall under each category.
- (β) The authority of local Churches in such matters is limited by the obligation of reference to that of the Church Universal. Thus a point which has quite definitely been settled by the latter may not be disputed by a local Church. On the other hand, when the judgment of the Church Universal is admittedly doubtful, or when a question has been deliberately left open, then the local Church is, so far, unfettered.

Under the Old Covenant we have, in the institution of the Feasts of Purim (Esth. ix. 26—28) and of Dedication (I Macc. iv. 52—59), instances of the exercise of an authority analogous to that contemplated by the Article. Thus also in Apostolic times were decided such questions as the veiling of women in the Christian assemblies (I Cor.

xi. 4—16), their silence at public worship and exhortation (I Cor. xiv. 34), and the due procedure at the celebration of the Agape and of the Liturgy (I Cor. xi. 16)<sup>1</sup>, as against those disposed to be contentious.

vii. The Second Point. But the Church has also "authority in Controversies of Faith<sup>2</sup>." That the Church Universal should have the power to distinguish truth from error, to settle disputes concerning the Faith, and to formulate in technical language the results of her deliberations is at least reasonable, if we accept the reality of Pentecost. This power is pledged to the Church by the terms in which our Lord promised to send the Holy Ghost (John xvi. 12—14); it is foreshadowed by His words to S. Peter concerning the power of the Keys (Matt. xvi. 17—19)<sup>3</sup>; it is implied in His last commission to make disciples of all the nations (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20)<sup>4</sup>; finally, it has been actually tested in history from the days of the Apostles onwards. The power thus entrusted was exercised (a) Individually by the Apostles, and (β) Collectively by the Church:—

(I) Individually:—

As when S. Paul charged the Ephesian elders to feed the Church of God and guard it against 1 El δέ τις δοκεῖ φιλόνεικος εἶναι, ἡμεῖς τοιαὐτην συνήθειαν οὐκ ἔχομεν, οὐδὲ αἰ ἐκκλησίαι τοῦ θεοῦ, τ Cor. xi. 16. On this verse see Bp. Andrew's Sermons, ii. p. 404. The Apostle here intimates "that none of the Churches of God, either those which he had not founded or those properly his own, allow such procedure in their ecclesiastical usages." Godet in loc.

2 The power of the Church to

Church deals with "Controversies of Faith," her standard is not mere local Use, but the dogmas of the Universal Church.

8 "Peter is to have the duties and powers, not of the master of the house—that Christ is and remains—but of the steward... What is here first, according to S. Matthew's account, only promised to Peter, was after the Resurrection bestowed upon him, at the third appearance of Jesus." Döllinger, First Age of the Church, i. p. 48.

4 See also John xxi. 15 sqq.

false teachers (Acts xx. 28—30)<sup>1</sup>; when he bade Timothy guard that which had been committed unto him<sup>2</sup> (I Tim. vi. 20), and hand on the treasure of truth to faithful men, who should be able to teach others also (2 Tim. ii. 2); when he wrote to Titus to hold to the faithful word which was according to the teaching (Titus i. 9);

(2) Collectively:-

As when the Council of Jerusalem decided that the Gentiles needed not to enter the Church by the gate of Judaism, speaking of its judgment as that of the Holy Ghost; and as when the Six Œcumenical Councils³ defined the faith concerning the Trinity in Unity and the Incarnation, denying heresy in terms of the metaphysical philosophy to which it appealed for its support.

Thus the Church is authorized to give judgment in matters of faith, and has a promise of the Divine guidance in so doing.

viii. The Third Point. But the Church is also, as the Article next proceeds to declare, "a witness and a keeper of holy Writ." This is in strict analogy with the function of the Jewish Church. Under the Old Testament Dispensation the Elect Nation was charged with the custody of the R.V., margin.

3 "The Council of Nice was assembled for the deciding of the controversy of Arius, and the time of the celebrating of Easter, the first of which was clearly a controversy of faith, the other a mere rite or ceremony." Bp. Beveridge on the Articles.

The prerogatives of the Apostolate were derived directly from God; they ceased to exist with the death of the last of the original recipients of them; one of these prerogatives was the individual, as distinct from the collective exercise of "authority in Controversies of Faith" over the Universal Church. Comp. Döllinger, First Age of the Church, ii. pp. 97, oracles of God (Rom. iii. 2)1, and every Sabbath the Scriptures were read in the Synagogues (Acts xv. 21). So to the Christian Church the Scriptures of the New Testament are entrusted as a sacred deposit to guard and to keep. How she did this in early times we have already seen? Existing. as she did, in full vitality before any of the Books of the New Testament were written<sup>3</sup>, she carefully distinguished them from the spurious writings, which might have taken their place; she collected the accepted writings into a Canon4; she drew the line between those she deemed to be proto-canonical, and others which she only recognized as being deutero-canonical. Since then she has continued to read the Scriptures in her assemblies; to translate them into the vernacular tongue of many of her children; to place them in their hands; to instruct from them by preaching and catechising; and to foster a reverence for them as the living oracles of God. Thus the Church has proved herself "a witness and a keeper of holy Writ."

"The Old Testament passed from the Jewish into the Christian Church as a sacred document, henceforth hers of right, which bore witness to Christ and His Church, and which both had been fulfilled and would be further fulfilled through Him, and the institution He founded." of the First Age, i. p. 240.

Heb. v. 12.

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;Mere historical evidence will show that S. John wrote the Fourth Gospel, and that S. Paul wrote the Epistles to the Corinthians. On the other hand we want something more than mere historical evidence to justify the position of the anonymous Epistle to the Hebrews within the Canon. Thus the Books of the New Testament will not stand alone either (i) in their entirety, or (ii) as all inspired, apart from the witness of the Church of which they form a part and to whose antecedent authority they themselves testify." See Gore's Rom. Cath. Claims, p. 56 n.

- ix. The Limiting Clauses. But the Article contains two important limiting clauses respecting the Authority of the Church:—
  - "It is not lawful for the Church to ordain any-(a) thing that is contrary to God's Word written. neither may it so expound one place of Scripture, that it be repugnant to another 1." The authority of the Church is so far not an unlimited and independent authority that the truth, to which she bears witness, comes from God, and not from her. God is the legislator, and the Scriptures contain the code of laws which He has ordained. Whatsoever authority, therefore, the Church possesses cannot be superior to God Himself. Her position is subordinate to Him, and she cannot ordain anything contrary to His Word written, nor wrest Scripture to justify her in so doing2.
    - (β) Moreover "besides the same (holy Writ) it (the Church) ought not to enforce anything to be believed for necessity of Salvation." This limitation applies especially to doctrine, and is almost a repetition of part of the Sixth Article<sup>3</sup>.

The limitation of the powers of the Church "is involved in the idea of its being under the real and not the imaginary government of a Divine Head, who can and will call it to account, if it mistakes its functions or forgets its responsibilities." F. D. Maurice on the Articles, p. 51.

The function of the Church is not to reveal truth, but to guard the truth revealed, and to hold fast what she has received. Her position is that of a witness to and a teacher of the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints (Jude 3). Her authority is so far "ministerial and declaratory, not absolute or supreme1." The Holy Scriptures are the sole Charter of the Faith; the Church is the interpreter, and her vocation is to unfold the old, not to reveal new truth2.

Development. The question of Development is one of terms. If, by Development, is intended the natural growth which characterizes every healthy organism, then the Church is continually developing. Such Development is part of her life. The Church never ceases to assimilate from her surroundings all that, from its affinity to herself, is capable of being so treated. But the Church can thus assimilate and express in doctrine, in worship or in discipline, nothing which is not already potentially her own. Ultimately, dogmatic definition is the explicit statement. that the Church has, in some direction, claimed her own. When the Church was developing her complete doctrine concerning the Incarnation, really she was, step by step, claiming for herself such great facts as the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, the Creation and the Destination of the World<sup>3</sup>.

fabric of ecclesiastical Christology is a thing absolutely outside the concrete personality of Jesus," but he is con-strained to add, "historical considerations nevertheless enable us not only to explain its origin, but also even to justify, in a certain degree, the way in which it was formulated." Exactly; it is "justified" by "historical considerations." Harnack, What is Christianity? E. T. p. 231. Ed. 1901.

Generall Counsels may not be gathered together without the commaundement and wyll of princes. And when they be gathered together (forasmuche as they be an assemblie of men, whereof all be not gouerned with the spirite and word of God) they may erre, and sometyme haue erred, euen in thinges parteynyng vnto God. Wherfore thinges ordayned by them as necessary to saluation, haue neyther strength nor aucthoritie, vnlesse it may be declared that they be taken out of holy Scripture.

- i. Title and Language. The Title of this Article has been uniform since the first draft in 1553. But in the text itself there is one important variation. In 1553 after the words "may err, and sometimes have erred," the clause ran "not only in worldly matters, but also in things pertaining unto God." The words in italics were omitted in 1563.
- ii. Object and Analyses. The object of the Article is a threefold one:—
  - (1) To set forth the channel or organ, through

"verbo." Comp. Hardwick, p. 303, ed. 1859.

- which the voice and judgment of the Church receive expression, viz. General Councils;
- (2) To vindicate the right of the Civil Authority to gather them together;
- (3) To lay it down that, even when so gathered together,
  - (a) "They may err, and sometimes have erred";
  - (b) That in matters necessary to salvation their decrees "have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they be taken out of holy Scripture."
- iii. The New Testament furnishes a distinct precedent in principle for Church Councils. In the Acts of the Apostles we find "the Apostles and Elders<sup>1</sup>" meeting together to consider solemnly the question of imposing or not imposing circumcision on the Gentile converts. The Apostles and Elders formally deliberate, and issue the decree, which goes forth in the name of the whole body, and is cordially accepted by the Church (Acts xv.)<sup>2</sup>.
- iv. Diocesan and Provincial Councils were, therefore, modelled on this precedent, and were summoned from time to time, especially during the Third Century, for determining matters of doctrine and discipline. Thus Victor held a council at Rome, A.D. 196, respecting the keeping of Easter, and in the same year other Councils were summoned in other places on the same subject. Cyprian held several councils at Carthage between A.D. 253 and 255 on the vexed question of the treatment of the lapsed and the rebaptism of heretics. Councils were also held at Antioch, A.D. 264, 265, respecting the heretical teaching of Paul of Samosata.

&lt;sup>2</sup> This Council is unique in the fact that Apostles were actually present at it, but we may not therefore infer that it is unique in the fact that its deliberations were Divinely directed and its judgment was that of the Holy Spirit. See Smith's Dict. Christian Antiquities, i. 474, b.

v. The first Œcumenical Council was summoned in A.D. 325 by the Emperor Constantine at Nicæa, and consisted entirely of Bishops of the Roman Empire, who owed allegiance to the Emperor<sup>1</sup>. It met to deal with the Arian heresy. (2) In A.D. 381 the Council of Constantinople was summoned by the Emperor Theodosius to deal with the opinions of Macedonius. (3) In A.D. 431 the Council of Ephesus was summoned by Theodosius II. to condemn the Nestorian heresy. (4) In A.D. 451 the Council of Chalcedon, suggested and requested by Leo the Great, was actually summoned by the Emperor Marcianus to condemn the heresy of Eutyches. (5) In A.D. 553 the second Council of Constantinople was summoned by the Emperor Justinian, and confirmed the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. (6) In A.D. 680 the third Council of Constantinople was summoned by the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus, and condemned the Monothelite heresy. These six are the only Councils, which have been acknowledged by the Universal Church. The fifth and sixth, however, have not been quite so universally esteemed as the first four, of which Gregory the Great was wont to say that "he reverenced them as he did the four Evangelists2."

vi. In the first three Centuries no Council was held which has been accepted as Œcumenical. Controversies concerning the Faith had not yet reached the stage at which it was possible to deal with them by way of Conciliar definition. But in Arianism heresy assumed an aggressive attitude and a dogmatic tone hitherto unknown to it. Moreover, then, for the first time, the Roman Empire was subject to a man who was a Christian and a protector of the Church, who could summon all Bishops and compel their attendance. When the Empire was divided, and its Eastern portion separated from the West, and later still, when Europe was split up into several nationalities, each having its own sovereign, and each speaking, more or less, its own language, the question arose, Who could summon a General Council? The power to do this was claimed by the Bishop of Rome, as possessing an universal dominion over the Church of Christ by virtue of his succession to the Primacy of S. Peter, and he began to exercise the power, hitherto enjoyed only by the Emperors, of calling together General Councils of the Church

vii. Power claimed by the Pope. But whereas, when Emperors summoned such Councils, all parts of Christendom obeyed, it was not so when the Pope claimed to exercise the same authority. The bishops, indeed, of the Roman obedience, felt bound to obey the summons, but the bishops of the ancient patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople, refused to assemble at the command of the Patriarch of the West<sup>1</sup>. The compilers of the Article remembered the early Councils and the later Roman claims, and were also influenced, doubtless, by the strong feeling of the day with regard to the authority of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical. For when the Pope called the Council of Trent, the English bishops and Convocation refused to acknowledge his right to summon it, holding that "neither the Bishop of Rome, nor any one prince of what state, degree, or preeminence soever he be, may by his own authority call, indict, or summon any General Council without the express consent, assent, and agreement of the residue of Christian princes<sup>1</sup>."

viii. Councils may err. When the Article asserts that, even when Councils are gathered together, they may err and have erred, it has been observed that this must be understood of General Councils "that pass for such?." The Councils summoned by the Pope, and acknowledged by the Churches of the Roman obedience, were commonly regarded as General Councils at the time the Articles were drawn up, as they are now in the Roman Communion. But the decrees of any Council, however at the time it may be representative of the Church, have not Œcumenical authority, until they have been endorsed by the consent of Catholic Christendom. Otherwise they have no justification for their claim to such authority.

ix. Supremacy of Scripture. When General Councils are gathered together, to what standard do they refer? The answer was symbolized in ancient times by placing a copy of the Holy Gospels on a throne in the midst of the

A General Council is not a necessity. It was impossible from one set of causes for the first three hundred years, but all through that period

the first four General Councils. They put forth their decisions as their interpretation of the Word of God. All Christendom received these interpretations as sound and true, and from that day to this they have been admitted by the Catholic Church as true Articles of Faith.

Decrees, and thus as to the Œcumenical character of the Council whose they are, rests with the educated instinct of the Church; it is a matter for the consensus post of Christendom; what is permanent and adequate persists, what is transitory and inadequate passes away.

<sup>1</sup> See Palmer On the Church, Part iv. ch. 8. "While the Church is in her present condition,...we must content ourselves with Councils less than Œcumenical though resting on their basis, and it is quite possible that it was not intended in God's Providence, that the formulation of Œcumenical dogmas should go beyond defining the basis of the Christian faith and life, as it is given in the Creeds. The imposition of a dogma as a condition of communion is a necessary evil, which should be kept within the smallest limits possible in view of the Church's safety; and a Church shows her life not by creating new dogmas, but by living on the old faith, and 'commending it to every man's conscience' by rendering it intelligible in view of new needs to new generations of men." Gore's Rom. Cath. Claims, p. 53.

ARTICLE XXII.

De Purgatorio.

Doctrina Romanensium de Purgatorio, de Indulgentijs, de veneratione et adoratione tum Imaginum tum Reliquiarum, nec non de inuocatione Sanctorum, res est futilis, inaniter conficta, et nullis Scripturarum testimonijs inniitur, imo verbo Dei contradicit. 1571.

Of l'urgatorie.

The Romishe doctrine concernyng purgatorie, pardons, worshipping and adoration as well of images, as of reliques, and also inuocation of Saintes, is a fonde thing, vainly inuented, and grounded vpon no warrantie of Scripture, but rather repugnaunt to the worde of God.

- i. Connection. In the previous Article it has been laid down that even in the case of General Councils their decrees must be shewn to be in accordance with Holy Scripture. In the present Article a protest is raised against certain popular abuses which had assumed serious proportions during the later Middle Ages and which are declared to be "grounded upon no warranty of Scripture," but to be "rather repugnant to the Word of God."
- ii. Title. The abuses alluded to fall under three heads. They concern (a) the Intermediate State, (b) the use of Images and Relics, and (c) the prayers of Saints Departed. But it is to be noticed that only one of these subjects, viz., that of Purgatory, is mentioned in the Title, which has been uniform since 1553, while all relate not so much to the Church Militant as to the Church Expectant. Two important variations in the text must not be passed over. In 1553 the Article began with the words "The doctrine of School Authors<sup>1</sup>." This term was altered in 1563 to "The Romish Doctrine2." Further, in the XLV Articles of 1552 the words "de precatione pro defunctis" occurred after the word "purgatorio." Their omission in 1553, owing to the influence of Cranmer, is evidence of the anxiety of the compilers not to condemn the Catholic doctrine concerning prayer for the Blessed Dead, as universally taught in the Liturgies of the Church.

iii. Object and Analysis. The object of the Article then, is to condemn the subtilities and abuses of extreme Mediævalists respecting the subjects which it specifies, and it affirms that their doctrine is (1) "A fond3 thing

1 Scholasticorum Doctrina. The Scholastic Divines systematized Divinity by the application to it of the reigning philosophy of Aristotle. The most celebrated were: (1) Albertus Magnus, a Dominican friar, who died A.D. 1280; (2) S. Bonaventura, the Seraphic Doctor, A.D. 1221-1279; (3) S. Thomas Aquinas, the Angelical Doctor, A.D. 1225—1274; (4) John Duns Scotus, the Subtil Doctor, 1274—1308; (5) William Ockham, the Singular Doctor, A.D. 1290—1347. The Articles are very far from condemning the Evangelical teaching of great names such as these.

<sup>2</sup> Doctrina Romanensium. The terms "Romanenses" and "Romanistæ" were used as far back as 1520 by Luther and Ulrich von Hutten, to designate the extreme Mediæval party. Cranmer, in his "Answer to Gardiner" uses the phrase, "your new Romish errors." Hardwick, p. 410, ed. 1890. The alteration by Parker of the words "Scholasticorum Doctrina" to "Doctrina Romanensium" in 1563,

"indicates that it was directed not so much against the formulated statements of Lombard or Aquinas, still less against the earlier teaching of the Greek and Latin Fathers, as against the popular current teaching of the Romish theologians of the time, and so far as the Tridentine decrees, with whatever reserves and limitations, embodied that teaching, they come under that condemnation." Dean Plumptre's Spirits in Prison, pp. 307, 308. As a fact, the Tridentine Decree concerning these subjects was not drawn up until Dec. 4, 1563, and is, therefore, not contemplated by the Article. The Decree in question condemns abuses as to Purgatory, and the Council was, upon the whole, reforming. Its De-Grees were only formally ratified on Jan. 6, 1564, by Papal Bull. See Hardwick, p. 82 note 3, and p. 410.

- v. Purgatory. The Mediæval doctrine of Purgatory was of gradual growth, and passed through various stages before it reached its final development:-
  - (1) We have already seen4 that the Jews and the early Christians believed in the existence of an intermediate state between death and the Final Judgment, but concerning this intermediate state itself, and the nature of the happiness or suffering awaiting the soul there, the earliest Christian Fathers maintained a great reserve<sup>5</sup>;
  - (2) We begin to trace the idea of a purifying fire after death in the writings of Tertullians and Origen, of Gregory Nazianzen7 and Gregory of

4 See above under Article iii., p. 62. <sup>5</sup> S.Clemens Romanus simply speaks of those who have finished their course in charity as possessing the region of the godly, έχουσιν χώρον εὐσεβών. Ερ. ad Cor. i. 50. S. Justin Martyr describes the souls of the godly as remaining in a certain better place, èv κρείττονί ποι χώρω μένειν, Dial. cum Tryph., cap. v., while the unjust and wicked remain in a worse, awaiting the day of judgment. "And thus some, appearing worthy of God, die no more, and some are punished (κολάζονται), έστ' αν αὐτὰς καὶ είναι καὶ κολάζεσθαι ὁ  $\Theta \epsilon \delta s \theta \epsilon \lambda \eta$  (so long as God wills them to exist and to be punished)." S. Irenæus argues that "each sort of men receive, even before the judgment, their due place of abode (dignam habitationem unamquamque gentem percipere etiam ante judicium)." Iren. Lib. 11. 63. S. Clement of Alexandria teaches that "the punishments of God in Hades are remedial and reformatory, and lead to repentance." Clem. Alex. Strom., vi.

Not, however, as it would seem, between death and the judgment, but at the revelation of the Great Day.

doctrine to the newly converted Teutonic tribes¹, by the authors of miracle-plays, by the Schoolmen, by poets, like Dante, who sum up the whole popular belief as to the intermediate state of Purgatory;

(4) Although in A.D. 1439 the Council of Florence propounded it as a dogma, the decree was not accepted by the Eastern Church<sup>2</sup>. At Trent, A.D. 1563, the Council claiming to be guided by the Holy Spirit, the Scriptures, and the Tradition of the Fathers, formally decreed that there is a Purgatory, and that souls detained<sup>3</sup> therein are aided by the sacrifice of the altar<sup>4</sup>, but it forbade the troubling the minds of the people generally with any of the more subtle questions on the subject.

vi. Holy Scripture contains nothing to support the crude, coarse doctrine of the "Romanenses" as to the Purgatorial State. We learn that there is an intermediate place of safe keeping and waiting between death and judgment, but there is no positive intimation that souls undergo there, amidst material flames, pains, which differ little, save in their temporary character, from the sufferings deputies at the Council, protested against it. The Eastern Church has never acknowledged its decrees. Palmer On the Church, IV. xi. 5.

&lt;sup>2</sup> At this Council there met besides many Italian bishops, the Greek Emperor, John Palæologus, and eighteen Eastern bishops. On their return to Constantinople, the Greek bishops were received with the utmost indignation by those whom they were supposed to represent. The decrees of Florence were absolutely rejected, the Synod was repudiated, and the patriarchs of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria, who were represented by

of the lost. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19-31) may suggest to us that a separation between the evil and the good awaits each one immediately after his departure out of this world, in that interval between death and the general resurrection, and that the evil and unrepentant have a foretaste of future misery<sup>1</sup>, and the good of future bliss. But this question is not essential to the teaching of the parable, and our Lord may merely be setting His message in the framework of current notions. Again when S. Paul declares that every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is (I Cor. iii. 12-15), it is quite probable that he has in mind the purgatorial work of the Great Day, but although this is strictly part of the Intermediate State, it is still in the future2. When, moreover, he prays for Onesiphorus that he may find mercy of the Lord in the days

1 Έν βασάνοις. Originally the word is applied to the test or touchstone of metals. Here the nature of the torments is suggested by the "flame" of the next verse, but that word does not necessarily imply the material element of fire. Rather it seems to indicate for the soul of the evil doer, when brought face to face with that holiness of God which is as a "consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 29), an anguish as intolerable as the touch of earthly flame is to the nerves of the mortal body. Compare Newman's Dream of Gerontius:—

"And these two pains, so counter and so keen,—

The longing for Him, when thou seest Him not,

The shame of self at thought of seeing Him—

Will be thy veriest, sharpest purgatory."

"The torment, especially of thirst, of the wicked, is repeatedly mentioned in Jewish writings. Thus, in one place, the fable of Tantalus is apparently repeated (Jer. Chag. 77. d). The righteous is seen beside delicious springs, and the wicked with his tongue parched at the brink of a river, the waves of which are constantly receding from him." Edersheim Life and Times of Jesus, ii., p. 281. Respecting the material flame and the burning tongue, "we may," writes Abp. Trench, "safely say that the form in which the sense of pain, with the desire after alleviation, embodies itself, is figurative." Trench On the Parables, p. 471 note, Ed. 1847.

That the Apostle is referring to the fire of the Great Day is evident from the context, and from such passages as 2 Thess. i. 7, "The revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of His power in flaming fire." Comp. also Heb. x. 27; xii. 29; 2 Pet. iii. 7.

3 Έν ἐκείνη τὴ ἡμέρα must refer to that day, when all judgment will be committed to the Son, John v. 22.

(2 Tim. i. 16, 18), there is nothing which implies, supposing Onesiphorus had departed this life, the suffering of a purgatorial cruciatus from which the Apostle sought to deliver him. If we turn to the Apostle's own language, and consider his statement on the subject of his own dissolution, we do not find anything that bears out such a doctrine. When he speaks of departing this life himself, it is to be with Christ1 (Phil. i. 23), to be, in some sense, nearer to Him than ever before. S. John, again, tells us how he heard a Voice from heaven, saying, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours2 (Rev. xiv. 13). We may, indeed, believe that the Intermediate State in the case of those, who have departed this life in God's holy fear, is a state of purification<sup>3</sup> and preparation for the Beatific Vision and the life of heaven, and that many, whose conversion here is maimed and imperfect, may by purgation ripen to such a degree of perfection as they are capable of, before they can endure the presence of God. But this is very different from the doctrine that there is for all souls after death a purgatorial fire4, from the pains of which relief can be obtained by the offering of masses in consideration of payments of money.

Yet that joy is not given in the same way but diversely, according to diversity of merits. 3 "This life is far more than a probation: it is an education, a discipline; and this aspect of existence by no means ceases at death. No unfair strain is put upon S. Paul's language by supposing that he distinctly contemplated a progressive work of grace in the soul between death and judgment. I am confident, he writes, of this very thing that He, who began in you a good work, will accomplish it until the day of Fesus Christ (Phili. i. 6)....We may hope that many, in whom conversion was very imperfect here, will then be ripened to such a degree of perfection as they are found capable of." vii. Pardons. Prayers and Masses for the dead, at first a mercy and consolation, became in time a trade and an inexhaustible source of wealth. Later still Pardons or Indulgences<sup>1</sup>, originally the remission of Ecclesiastical Censures, and granted by Bishops and afterwards by Provincial Councils<sup>2</sup>, became extended in their significance, and were understood to effect the remission of years, sometimes of centuries, of Purgatory. In process of time Indulgences were still further extended to liberal almsgiving, pilgrimages, and taking part in holy wars like the Crusades. The sale of them reached its greatest height in the Pontificate of Leo X., when Tetzel, the agent of that Pope<sup>2</sup>, openly sold mere doctrine than to the mass of flagrant abuses with which it became identified. The primitive doctrine of a place of purification is not condemned by the Article. It is noticeable that the Article does not formulate the doctrine which it condemns. Gregory of Nazianzus speaks of the "benignant, the philanthropic fire worthy of Him who chastises (κολά-(ovros), by which men are to be purified from evil." Orat. xl. 6. "As no soul leaves this present existence in fully complete and prepared state, we must suppose that there is an intermediate state, a realm of progressive development in which souls are prepared and matured for the final judgment. The Roman doc-trine...contains the truth that the intermediate state must, in a purely spiritual sense, be a Purgatory designed for the purifying of the soul."

Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p. 457, E. T. Thus, on grounds of reason, we may conclude that there are few souls which "depart hence in the Lord" in such a state of holiness as to be fit for the Beatific Vision. Amongst passages of Scripture, which have been held to bear upon this point, are Matt. v. 26 and i Pet. iii. 19. See the Appendix, Note on the Intermediate State. 1 Indulgentia in Classical Latin was a Roman law-term, and meant remission of (i) punishment or (ii) taxation on the occasion of the accession of a new emperor or of the birth of an imperial or royal prince. As an ecclesiastical expression it denoted (i) the remission of sins, (ii) the lightening of ecclesiastical penalties. The question of such relaxation first came up in the case of those who had lapsed during the Decian persecution, and for whom martyrs interceded.

<sup>2</sup> As Provincial Councils frequently referred such matters to the See of Rome, that See gradually claimed and exercised a dispensing power independent of Councils, and the Bishop of Rome was held to have a storehouse of merits of Christ and of the Saints, which he could dispense, either by himself or his agents, to mitigate or shorten the sufferings of penitents, whether in this world or the world to come. See Article "Indulgence" in Smith's Dict. Christian Ant. 1. p. 834-

them throughout Germany, and by so doing precipitated the Teutonic revolt. The idea that the temporal penalties for sin in the Intermediate State can be remitted by a money payment did untold harm, as Chaucer and other writers1 testify, and gave rise to the saying of our forefathers, "No penny, no Paternoster." Long before the sixteenth century this abuse had rankled in the heart of Christendom. The reforming Councils, however, had no power to stem the increasing corruption, and owing to the expensive tastes of the Roman Curia demanding more and more money, a doctrine, "which had its roots in primitive antiquity, was preached in a way to destroy all Christian morality2."

viii. The Teaching of Scripture. The doctrine of Pardons or Indulgences rests on the doctrine that the merits of the Saints, over and above what were needed for their own salvation, technically called "works of supererogation," constitute an inexhaustible treasury, on which the Pope has a right to draw and apply to the release of souls

"There preched a Pardonere; as he a prest were, Brouzt forth a bulle; with bishopes

The poem ends with a peroration on the small value of the Pope's pardons, and the superiority of a righteous life over mere trust in indulgences at the last Great Day. See Skeat's Edition, Clarendon Press, p. xxx.

Germany, alarmed at the progress of Lutheranism, met in Diet at Nuremberg in 1522, and addressed a petition to Pope Hadrian VI. for the remedy of a "Hundred Grievances of the German Nation," which they set forth in that document. Amongst these occur, No. 5, "How license to sin with impunity is granted for money"; No. 67, "How more money than penitence is exacted from sinners."
"What wickedness," the princes ask, " will mortals shudder at any longer, when they have once persuaded themselves that license and impunity for sinning can be had for money, however extravagant the sum, not only in this life but after death also, by means of these marketings of Indulgences?" See Brown's Fasciculus Rerum, London, 1690, i. pp. 334—393; also Milman's Latin Christianity, ix. p. 343; Bp Forbes On the Articles, p. 353.

in Purgatory, so that anyone, who obtains an Indulgence, can apply its merits to himself or transfer it to some other. living or dead. But we have already seen that none of the Saints were free from the stain of Original Sin, and so could not perform works of superabundant merit. When S. Paul says to his Corinthian converts that he will most gladly spend and be spent for their souls (2 Cor. xii. 15); when he tells the Colossians that he rejoices in his sufferings for their sake, and fills up on his part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in his flesh for His body's sake, which is the Church (Col. i. 24); whatever else he means, it seems indeed a straining of words to believe that he intended us to understand that he was adding to an infinite store of merits, which could be applied for the deliverance of souls. The merits of Christ, it is allowed, are infinite, and therefore the merits of all the Saints together1 which at best are finite, cannot make His merits greater or more efficient.

- ix. The Worshipping and Adoration of Images and Relics. In the Primitive Church the feeling against the adoration of
  - (a) Images was very strong. The Jewish Christians were naturally imbued with a horror of them, and many of the early Fathers speak, like they have truly exposed themselves to the reproach which Estius indignantly repudiates on their behalf, 'quasi Christus non satis passus sit ad redemptionem nostram, ideoque supplemento martyrum opus habeat; quod impium est sentire, quodque Catholicos dicere impie calumniantur hæretici'." See Lightfoot's Commentary on Col., in loc., p. 233. "So far as regards this particular passage, the Roman doctrine can only be imported into it at the cost of a contradiction to the Pauline doctrine of the satisfaction of Christ." See Bp Lightfoot's Comm. in loc.

Clement of Alexandria<sup>1</sup>, of "the impropriety of making an image of God, the best image of whom is man created after His likeness." The sign, indeed, of the Cross was constantly made by Christians on their foreheads, at their going out and coming in, at meals, at the baths, at lying down and rising up2. But, as Minucius Felix says, they "neither worshipped crosses nor wished to do so3." In the fourth and fifth centuries, however, a tendency to pay reverence to images began to appear in some quarters, and they gradually found admittance into the Churches. In the eighth century the famous Iconoclastic controversy arose, and continued for many years, till a Council summoned at Constantinople, A.D. 754, condemned all worship and use of images4. But these decrees were reversed by the Second Council of Nice, summoned by the Empress Irene, A.D. 784, which enacted that images might be set up, salutations and honour paid to them, and incense offered, but not the worship of Latreia, which was due to God alone. As the Middle Ages advanced, carved representations began to be set up, which were supposed to be possessed of miraculous powers for the cure of diseases. It is these images, which the framers of the Articles had before their eyes in England. Such was the Crucifix at Boxley in Kents,

(b) Relics.

In the early ages of the Church there was a marked inclination to pay much respect to the remains of martyrs<sup>2</sup>. While it was regarded as a privilege by the early Christians to save their bodies after their passion, to collect and preserve their bones, they indignantly repudiated the idea of worshipping them. But the practice, when pushed to an extreme, began to foster superstition<sup>8</sup>, and S. Augustine complains of the custom, then beginning, of people wandering about his Diocese, and selling relics<sup>4</sup>, or what they reported to be relics, of those who had suffered martyrdom. During the Middle Ages, and especially after the Crusades, relictionship reached its highest point. The condreds in number, brought oxen and cattle and money; a huge image of our Lady at Worcester; an image of our Lady with a taper in her hands at S. David's, "which was believed to have burnt nine years, till one forswearing himself upon it, it went out; and was then much reverenced and worshipped." Burnet's Hist. Ref. i. 488.

quest of Jerusalem poured upon Europe a countless supply of sacred objects. A splinter of the true Cross, some memorial of the Virgin-Mother and her Son, the bone of an Apostle, became the most precious treasures of the most beautiful Churches, and were regarded as possessing the power of working miracles.

x. The teaching of the Scriptures as regards Images and Relics may be thus summarised.

(i) Images.

The Jews, as we all know, were solemnly warned against any approach to idolatry, but they were instructed to place emblematical figures in the Tabernacle and the Temple, e.g. the Cherubim on each side of the Mercy-Seat (Ex. xxv. 18), the oxen, lions, and Cherubim round the Molten Sea (1 Kings vii. 23, 25). The idea, however, of worshipping these figures never occurred to them. It is true, again, that when Moses set up the brazen serpent in the wilderness the wounded Israelites were taught to look up to it for healing and deliverance (Numb. xxi. 8, 9), but when the people were tempted to worship it, Hezekiah, in spite of all its venerable associations, broke it in pieces (2 Kings xviii. 4). It is not to be denied that images and pictures are legitimate aids to devotion, representing as they do in concrete form the historical facts and personages submitted to the reverent contemplation of the faithful. The Church has never formally pronounced against their use. But she has recognized the warnings of the Old Testament, and it is no wonder that, in the face of these warnings, the leaders of the new movement in the Sixteenth Century regarded figures supposed to be possessed of miraculous powers with extreme disfavour, and viewed with suspicion the distinctions drawn between the kinds of worship, which might or might not be addressed to them.

(ii) Relics.

In extenuation of relic-worship it is pleaded that miracles were wrought by the bones of Elisha (2 Kings xiii. 21), by touching the hem of Christ's garment (Matt. ix. 20-22), by the shadow of Peter passing through the streets of Jerusalem (Acts v. 15), by handkerchiefs and aprons brought from the body of S. Paul (Acts xix, 12). But we have no instance in Scripture of the bones or garments of the Saints being treated as objects of superstitious worship or as instruments of wonder-working, so as to dispense men from the pursuit of inward holiness and from the use of the natural means of bodily healing. It was not so with the body of S. Stephen (Acts viii. 2), nor with the linen brought from the body of S. Paul (Acts xix. 12). The relics of the Saints have a relative sanctity and deserve our reverential regard, but, as we have seen, the contemporaries of S. Polycarp indignantly denied that they wished for his body with a view to any superstitious purpose<sup>1</sup>, and S. Augustine severely reproved the sale of relics, which in his day had grown into an abuse.

xi. The Invocation of Saints. Prayers for the departed have entered into the ritual of every Jewish synagogue from the earliest times, and there is no question that this custom prevailed early amongst the primitive Christians. They had a lively conviction that the saints departed were still fellow-worshippers with the Church militant here on earth, and were in close communion with its members<sup>2</sup>, that "between the living and the dead in Christ there is a vital bond of union and joint participation of privilege and responsibility1." In the course of time the affectionate interest of the early Christians in the state of those who had gone behind the veil, and their belief that they still prayed with them and for them, fostered the inclination to ask the departed to offer prayers for them, and the inscriptions in the Catacombs afford traces of such a practice. When we reach the Fourth Century<sup>2</sup> we have, in the writings of S. Basil, S. Chrysostom, S. Ambrose, S. Augustine and others, clear evidence that it was not unusual directly to address Invocation to the Saints<sup>3</sup>. A Christian devotion, thus consecrated by the usage of many centuries, reached, in the later Middle Ages, such a height as to violate "the proportion of the Faith." and, even at times, to overshadow the worship due to Christ Himself<sup>4</sup>. It was, with some caution and moderation, laid down in the decrees of the Council of Trent that "the Saints reigning together with Christ offer their prayers for men to God, and that it is good and useful to invoke them as suppliants, and, for the sake of obtaining benefits from God through our Lord Jesus Christ, Who is our only Redeemer and Saviour, to have recourse to their prayers, aid, and assistance5."

xii. Teaching of the Scriptures. The Invocation, then, rebuked in the Article is that kind of Invocation which trenches on the incommunicable honour due to God alone<sup>6</sup>. This rebuke Scripture sanctions. For in the New Testament we have two instances of adoration offered to Angels (Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8, 9), and two offered to Apostles (Acts x. 25, 26; xiii. 14), and each time it is refused. It is quite true that subtle distinctions can be drawn between degrees of worship, and it may be said that, while divine honours are paid to God, only secondary worship is offered to the Saints. But all history tends to show that in dealing with the ignorant it is not easy to preserve these distinctions. When S. Paul warns his Colossian converts against the worshipping of angels (Col. ii. 18), he uses a Greek word which denotes all external worship<sup>1</sup>. It seems allowable to believe that the Saints in the disembodied state are engaged in ceaseless supplication, and that by an act of faith we may join our supplications with theirs. But there is no Scripture warrant for believing that they have power with God because of their own merits apart from those of our Lord, or that they are kinder and have more sympathy with sinners than Christ our Saviour, Who offered Himself for us on the Altar of His Cross. As to whether we may rightly invoke them to join with us in prayer has always been regarded by theologians as depending upon whether they already enjoy the Beatific Vision. If there be Saints single challenge might suffice; that whereas God hath in Scripture delivered us so many patterns for imitation when we pray, yea, framed ready to our hands in a manner all, for suits and supplications, which our condition of life on earth may at any time need, there is not one, no not one to be found, directed unto angels, saints, or any, saving God alone." Hooker, Sermons. vii. 1; Works, Vol. ii. p. 793. Ed. 1841.

<sup>6</sup> In one of his Sermons Hooker says, "Against invocation of any other than God alone, if all arguments else should fail, the number whereof is both great and forcible, yet this very bar and

1 Θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων. The word θρησκεία is a usual term for the service of the Jewish Temple. Primarily it denotes religious worship in its external aspect, a cullus: comp. Acts xxvi. 5; Jas. i. 26, 27. "It is noticeable that the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 394), so near Colossæ, forbids (c. 35) Christians to leave the Church and go away 'to name angels' in secret assemblies, calling this a 'secret idolatry.' Theodoret in his Commentary here speaks of the existence in his time (Cent. v) of oratories (eucl*ria) to the Archangel Michael in the region of Laodicea and Colossæ, and of their popularity, apparently as rivals to the regular Churches." The Cambridge Bible, in loc.

Departed who have so far entered into Glory as to see God Himself, then, in seeing Him, they see all things¹. Moreover, the Ministry of the Angels affords the analogy of a disembodied service more varied and more resourceful than that of mere intercession². It would be difficult to prove that the formularies of the English Church forbid a practice of such antiquity, but it would be equally difficult to prove that they encourage it³.

by that of Trent.

The evidence of the Latin Sacramentaries, the source of so many of our Prayer-Book Collects, goes to prove that certainly in the fifth century, probably earlier, frequent commemoration was made of the interventus, opitulatio, preces, suffragium, even peculiare prasidium of the Saints. These expressions, however, are found in such connection with certain others, e.g. veneranda confessio, robur, patientia, as to show that, ultimately, the principle underlying the practice is that solidarité of the Σωμα Χριστού to which S. Paul refers in I Cor. xii. 20 sqq. Comp. Neale and Forbes, Gallican Liturgies, Pt I. Ed. 1855. 3 As regards the Invocation of Saints Launcelot Andrewes agrees with Origen in Epist. ad Rom. lib. ii. that our relations to the saints are among "the hidden things of God" ("inter occulta Dei, nec chartulæ committenda mysteria"). "That they intercede for us," he says, "is probable: a pious and well-founded hope. That they hear prayers is not proved. We cannot invoke them, because we have no command warranting us to do so," ("eos autem haud libenter quis compellet, de quibus, qua tandem ratione audiant compellantem, et proinde audiant necne, certus non sit"). #### ARTICLE XXIII.

Non licet cuiquam sumere sibi munus publicè prædicandi, aut administrandi Sacramenta in Ecclesia, nisi prius fuerit ad hæc obeunda legitimè uocatus et missus. Atque illos, legitimè uocatos et missos existimare debemus, qui per homines, quibus potestas uocandi Ministros atque mittendi in uineam Domini publicè concessa est in Ecclesia, cooptati fuerint et asciti in hoc opus.

It is not lawful for any man to take vpon hym the office of publique preachyng, or ministring the Sacramentes in the congregation, before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to iudge lawfully called and sent, whiche be chosen and called to this worke by men who haue publique aucthoritie geuen vnto them in the congregation, to call and sende ministers into the Lordes vineyarde.

- i. Connection. Having dealt with the constitution and authority of the Church, as also with the channels through which the voice of the Church is made known, the Articles proceed to speak of the Ministers of the Church, and to lay down the necessity of their having a valid call and a regular mission. This came out more clearly in the original title of the Article, "Nemo in Ecclesia ministret nisi vocatus," "no man may minister in the congregation, except he be called."
- ii. Source. The Article is founded on the Fourteenth Article of the Confession of Augsburg<sup>1</sup>, which states that "no one ought to preach or administer the Sacraments publicly in Church, who is not rightly called." This expression has been adopted in our Article, but the word "rite," duly or rightly, has been altered to "legitime," lawfully, and "missus," sent, has been added to called, so that the sentence now runs, "before he be lawfully called, and sent to execute the same."

iii. Object. As originally drawn up the Article had for its object to controvert the teaching of the Anabaptists, who maintained that anyone, believing himself called to the work of the Ministry, had a right to exercise his functions as a preacher in defiance of all Church-order or authority. Thus we are told that "a bricklayer taking upon him the office of preaching, affirmed he might lawfully do it, though he were not called thereunto by the Church. For Spiritus ubi vult spirat<sup>1</sup>."

iv. Analysis. The Article contains two propositions:—

- (α) That no man may assume the office of the Ministry without a lawful call and mission;
- (β) That such calling and mission can only be given by those "who have publick authority given unto them in the Congregation to call and send Ministers into the Lord's vineyard<sup>2</sup>."

Thus it is distinctly laid down that the Church is an organized body, and that it is separated from those aggregates of individuals, to whom Christianity is a so-called "spiritual" matter only. It is true that there is no their high authorities, according to the ordinances of this realm." In the xiii. Articles of 1538 the xth Article ran: "De Ministris Ecclesiæ docemus, quod nemo debeat publice docere, aut Sacramenta administrare, nisi rite vocatus, et quidem ab his, penes quos in Ecclesia, juxta verbum Dei et leges ac consuetudines uniuscujusque regionis, jus est vocandi et admittendi."

Or as it is expressed in the Fourth of the Eleven Articles of 1559, "It is not lawful for any man to take upon him any office or ministry, either ecclesiastical or secular, but such only as are lawfully thereunto called by definition here either of the nature of Ordination or of the lawful authority essential to call and mission. But this definition is practically supplied by the Ordinal, which really interprets the meaning of the Article, and expresses the mind of its compilers on the subject.

v. The Principle of Order in the Old Testament. Respecting the first of these two propositions it is in truth a matter of common sense, which applies not only to Church Order, but to any order in Church or State. If any one may take upon himself the office of a governor at his own will, and exercise the same at his own discretion, the most complete disorder must be the inevitable result. Hence it is not surprising that under the Jewish Law we find the principle of order recognised with the utmost carefulness. The whole nation indeed was regarded as dedicated to God and as constituting His people', yet only one tribe was allowed to perform priestly offices before Him, and of that tribe only one family, the family of Aaron, might hold the office of high priest. Any violation of this enactment was severely punished, as in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Num. xvi.), of Saul when he offered sacrifice at Gilgal instead of waiting for Samuel (I Sam. xiii), of Uzziah, when he ventured to burn incense in the Sanctuary (2 Chron. xxvi. 16—19).

vi. In the New Testament, again, we find our Lord waiting upwards of thirty years in seclusion and retirement before He enters upon His public ministry<sup>2</sup>, and He does not enter upon it then till the Holy Spirit has descended upon Him at His Baptism, and He has received His commission from the Father visibly acknowledging Him and saying, Thou art My beloved Son: in Thee I am well pleased (Luke iii. 22). Even He glorified not Himself to be made a High Priest (Heb. v. 5)1. Again, during His Ministry He did not give to every one indiscriminately His commission to preach and to baptize. He Himself after a long night of prayer chose the Apostles (Luke vi. 12, 13), and to their training He devoted all His energies. He Himself also appointed seventy others, and sent them two and two before His face into every city and place, whither He Himself was about to come (Luke x. 1). Thus during His life on earth our Lord recognized and consecrated the principle upon which men are called and sent to minister on His behalf, by a method not of "elevation from below," but of "devolution from above?." That He should have thus acted belongs to the conception of His Messianic Mission, in which were united and fulfilled (not abrogated) all the essential functions of the Old Law.

vii. Apostolic Times. In the Acts and the Epistles we find existing the Church Orders<sup>4</sup> of Elders and Deacons<sup>5</sup>, and at first the term Bishop was used indifferently with the

1 Οὐχ ἐαυτὸν ἐδόξασε γενηθῆναι ἀρχιερέα, ἀλλ' ὁ λαλήσας πρὸς αὐτόν, Τίός μου εἶ σύ, ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε, Heb. v. 5. "It is not said that 'Jesus' glorified not Himself, but 'the Christ,' the appointed Redeemer, glorified not Himself... Christ, as sinless man, could approach God for Himself; but He waited for His Father's appointment that He might approach God as Son of Man for sinful humanity." Bp Westcott in loc.

3 Our Blessed Lord, the Source of all grace, is the fountain head of the Christian Ministry. In His sacred Person He summed up all the offices of the Ministry. Thus in the New Testament He receives the title of Apostle (Heb. iii. 1); Bishop (r Pet. ii. 25); Priest (Heb. v. 6); Deacon (Luke xxii. 27).

4 That Christ intended that they

"That Christ intended that they should be His representatives in the world is plain from His own declaration, He that heareth you heareth Me, and he that rejecteth you rejecteth Me, and he that rejecteth Me rejecteth Him that sent Me, Luke x. 16.

that sent Me, Luke x. 16.

5 Acts vi. 1—6. We soon find the diaconate in the Gentile churches also (Rom. xii. 7), and a deaconess, no doubt for the ministrations to the half-secluded women of a Greek town, in the Church at Cenchreæ (Rom. xvi. 1). That the office mentioned in Acts vi.

term Elder to describe the same Minister. At the period of the Pastoral Epistles we find certain Elders to have been endowed by the Apostles both with the power of ordaining others and with a limited monarchical authority (I Tim. v. passim; Tit. i. 5)<sup>1</sup>. From the first there is evidence of a Ministry delegated from above. We can find no trace of persons being allowed at random or on their own initiative to exercise spiritual functions.

viii. Our Lord's sense of Mission. The second proposition advanced in the Article is that calling and mission can only be given to the Clergy by those who have public authority in the Church to do so. This principle has been recognised from the beginning. Even Christ, as we have just seen, glorified not Himself to be made a High Priest (Heb. v. 5), and again and again we find Him dwelling on the fact of His divine mission as an animating and inspiring power. This sense of mission does not cease even after His Resurrection. When on the evening of the first Easter Day He revisits the Apostles in the upper room, He bids them carry on not a new, but His commission. As the Father hath sent Me, He says, even so send I you<sup>2</sup> (John xx. 21). And just before His

¹ In promoting the rise of the episcopate, which slept in the Apostolate, the example of the presidency exercised by S. James at Jerusalem must have had great effect in Syria. An early tradition ascribes a special agency in this matter to the Apostle S. John, who is said to have appointed bishop in the Churches of Asia Minor—"Asia Minor was," says Bp Lightfoot, "the nurse, if not the mother, of episcopacy in the Gentile Churches." Philippians, p. 206. "S. James, the Lord's brother, clearly enjoyed in Jerusalem the local preeminence and authority (Acts xv. 13; xxi. 18; Gal. i. 19) which justified later writers in calling him bishop of Jerusalem; and the Apostolic authority of S. John was probably in his latter days so far localized in Ephesus and its neighbourhood that we may well call him bishop of that city. Cheetham's Church History, p. 31.

<sup>2</sup> Καθώς ἀπέσταλκέ με ὁ Πατήρ, κάγὼ πέμπω ὑμᾶς. The tense here used has an emphasis of its own. He says not as the Father sent Me, as though He was speaking of something past, Ascension He utters His last command. All authority hath been given unto Me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost ... and lo, I am with you all the days, even unto the end of the world (Matt. xxviii. 18-20). Thus, then, as the Father sent the Son, so the Son Himself sent the Apostles.

ix. The Apostles also, when the time came, sent and commissioned those who succeeded them. We do not read in the New Testament that either Timothy or Titus derived their authority to act at Ephesus and Crete by delegation from below. As, when the Lord Jesus was on earth, He alone ordained1, so after His Ascension the Apostles acted as the ministers of Ordination<sup>2</sup>. S. Paul gives to Timothy and Titus their commission. He ordains them (2 Tim. i. 6); he locates the one in the capital of Roman Asia (1 Tim. i. 3); he assigns to the other the island of Crete (Tit. i. 5). In these respective districts he authorises them to execute some of the same functions3 which he had himself exercised in his own wider sphere of labour. He clothes them with power to ordain (I Tim. iii. 1-13; Tit. i. 5); to set in order the public services (1 Tim. ii. 1, 2 &c.); to execute discipline (1 Tim. v. 17); to rebuke, exhort, admonish those that erred (2 Tim. iv. 2; Tit. i. 13); and to provide in their turn for a due succession of faithful men in the office of teaching (2 Tim. ii. 2). indeed, S. Paul specially reminds Timothy how Grace for the Ministry had been given him<sup>1</sup> by the laying on of Apostolic hands (2 Tim. i. 6)<sup>2</sup>.

x. Sub-Apostolic times. When we pass from Apostolic to Sub-Apostolic times we find that within the lifetime of those who had learned from the Apostles in person, the Three Orders are widely established. S. Clement, representing as Bishop the Roman Church, writes to the Corinthians, "The Apostles received the Gospel³ for us from the Lord Jesus Christ; Jesus Christ was sent forth from God. So then Christ is from God, and the Apostles are from Christ. Both therefore came of the will of God in the appointed order. Having therefore received a charge they went forth,...and preaching everywhere in country and town they appointed their firstfruits, when they had proved them by the Spirit, to be bishops and deacons unto them that should believe." "Give ye heed to the Bishop," writes Ignatius, "that God also

1 "With less permanence but perhaps greater authority, the position occupied by these Apostolic delegates fairly represents the functions of the bishop early in the second century." Bp Lightfoot's Philippians, p. 199. Bp Lightfoot's view that the Episcopate was formed "out of the presbyteral (order) by elevation" depends upon the assumption that this delegation was temporary.

The Apostles had, however, received no power from Christ to confer the Apostolate upon others; the vocation and bestowal came direct from God. Comp. Döllinger, First Age of the Church, i. pp. 91 sqq.: Eng. ed.

3 "Though the New Testament itself contains as yet no direct and indisputable notices of a localized episcopate in the Gentile Churches, as distinguished from the moveable episcopate exercised by Timothy in Ephesus, and by Titus in Crete, yet there is satisfactory evidence of its development in the later years of the Apostolic age,...and that in the early years of the second century the episcopate was widely spread and had taken firm root, more especially in Asia Minor and Syria. If the evidence on which its extension in the regions East of the Ægean at this period be resisted, I am at a loss to understand what single fact relating to the history of the Christian Church during the first half of the second century can be regarded as established; for the testimony in favour of this spread of the episcopate is more abundant and more varied than for any other institution or event during this period, so far as I can recollect." Bp Lightfoot's Epistles of S. Ignatius, i. pp. 376, 377.

may give heed to you. I am devoted to those who are subject to the Bishop, the Presbyters, the Deacons. May it be granted to me to have my portion with them in the presence of God!" Irenæus speaks distinctly of successions of presbyters in the Church from the time of the Apostles, and recounts the succession of Bishops at Rome from S. Peter and S. Paul, and at Smyrna from S. Polycarp<sup>2</sup>. Tertullian enumerates together the three Orders of Bishops. Presbyters, and Deacons, and asserts that the two latter could baptize, but not without the authority of the Bishops3. From the time of Origen the distinction of Bishops, Priests. and Deacons admits of no question, and it may be regarded as certain that in very early ages, in every quarter of the world whither the Church had penetrated, in every city there was one Summus Sacerdos, presiding over the Clergy of that city and its suburb (παροικία), and that to him was committed the power of Ordination, or, in the language of the Article, he had "publick authority given unto him in the Congregation, to call and send Ministers into the Lord's vineyard4."

xi. View of the English Church. In the English Church it has ever been held that the Bishop is the proper Minister of Ordination, and this primitive rule has never been infringed. In the Necessary Doctrine and Erudition

Tertull. de Baptismo, c. 17.

4 Bishop Browne, On the Articles, p. 555. The expression "the Congregation" here used is equivalent to "the Church," as is clear from the Latin of the Article, where it is translated by "Ecclesia." Comp. S. Jerome, Ep. 146. Exalting the presbyterate, he asks, "Quid enim faciet, excepta ordinatione, Episcopus, quod non faciat Presbyterus?"

for any Christian Man, put forth A.D. 1543, we find the strongest language used concerning "Order" as "the gift or grace of Ministration in Christ's Church, given of God to Christian men by the consecration and imposition of the bishop's hands, and concerning a continual succession even to the end of the world<sup>1</sup>." Cranmer's Catechism of 1548 insists upon Episcopal Ordination<sup>2</sup>. The Ordinal in 1549 declared the Three Orders to date "from the Apostles' times." This is the Ordinal of our Book of Common Prayer, and the language of its Preface regarding what constitutes "a lawful Bishop, Priest, or Deacon in the Church of England" is unequivocal<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> The English Church emphasizes Apostolical Succession. She holds that it belongs to the New Covenant "ordinem episcopalem fuisse in ipsis apostolis institutum ac per successionem ab ipsis propagatum" (Pearson, Determinatio Theol. i., quoted Gore, Ministry of Christian Church, p. 70n.). An organic body must have a continuity of its own. A body existing under present material conditions, a body of men and women in the flesh, must have a continuity of the same character. The Church is, as it were, a great Sacrament with its own essential "outward and visible sign." A material as well as a spiritual continuity is only what we should expect from the fact of the Incarnation. As a matter of history Apostolical Succession has always been regarded as the "means whereby we receive" from age to age the pastoral care of Christ Himself, and as "a pledge to assure us thereof." "Apostoli...acceperunt totam potestatem a Christo: quidquid erat in eis personale, cum ipsis mortuum est; quidquid erat omnibus ecclesiae temporibus necessarium, ipsorum, dum viverent, manibus transmissum est" (Pearson, ut supr.). It is only false philosophy to depreciate the material setting of the spiritual.

Granted such a setting, and granted that its form is necessary and not contingent, there remains the appeal to history as to what that form is. A priori can we suggest anything better than what is understood by Apostolical Succession?

i I had the privilege of spending some days with Bishop Lightfoot at Auckland Castle shortly before his death, and he then told me that the study of the early records of Christianity had left no doubt whatever in his mind as to the Apostolic-which, in fact, meant the Divine-origin of Episcopacy, although with that large charity and gentleness which characterized him, he would not presume to pass any judgment on Christian communities differently organized. 'To their own Master,' he said, 'they stand or fall. He knows what allowance to make for a multitude of things which are hidden from me. Our plain duty is to guard faithfully what has been committed to us and leave others to Him who judgeth righteously'." Canon MacColl, Preface to Christianity in relation to Science and Morals, pp. xxxvi, xxxvii.

It is a thing playnely repugnaunt to the worde of God, and the custome of the primitiue Churche, to haue publique prayer in the Churche, or to minister the Sacramentes in a tongue not vnderstanded of the people.

- i. Connection. This Article naturally succeeds the preceding, for if the Ministers of the Church must be duly authorized and called, the next natural enquiry is, In what language ought they to officiate?
- ii. Object of the Article. To this question the Mediævalists replied, that the Latin tongue is the proper vehicle for public worship. It is this position which it is the object of the Article to controvert, and it affirms that the language used in the performance of divine worship should always be intelligible to the people<sup>1</sup>.
- iii. The Wording of the Article has undergone considerable modification since the issue of the first draft in 1553. It then began, "It is most seemly, and most agreeable to the word of God, that in the congregation nothing be openly read, or spoken in a tongue unknown to the people<sup>1</sup>." In 1563 this clause was made much stronger, and in place of the words, "It is most seemly," we have substituted, "It is a thing playnely repugnaunt to the worde of God, and the custome of the primitiue Churche, to have publique prayer in the Churche, or to minister the Sacramentes in a tongue not vnderstanded of the people." The alteration may have been due to a knowledge of what was going on in the Council of Trent, which maintained the Latin language as the ordinary vehicle of worship, and affirmed that "it had not seemed expedient to the Fathers that the Mass should be everywhere celebrated in the vulgar tongue<sup>2</sup>."

- iv. Analysis. The Article affirms that such a mode of conducting public worship is repugnant
  - (a) to the Word of God,
  - $(\beta)$  and the custom of the Primitive Church.
- v. Holy Scripture. The idea of approaching God in worship in a tongue unknown to the worshippers is quite foreign to the entire tenor of the Old Testament, while in the New Testament we have four points clearly brought out:—
  - (I) We have no trace of any custom on the part of our Lord of praying Himself or of teaching His Apostles to pray, or of speaking to those of His generation, in an unknown language;

3 "Ινα και άλλους κατηχήσω. The verb from the nature of the context retains here some tinge of its more restricted meaning "voce instituo,"

Beza.

<sup>4</sup> Τοῦ lδιώτου, I Cor. xiv. 16. Ἰδιώτης and its use are copiously illustrated by Wetstein. The word denotes (I) a private person as opposed to one in office, or in a profession, a layman, as in Acts iv. 13, ἀγράμματοι είσι καὶ ἰδιῶται, or (2) an unlearned and ignorant person.

5 The reference here to τη εὐχα-ριστία, "the giving of thanks," and to the "Amen," tends to show that the Apostle, as Bp Wordsworth says, is speaking here of the Celebration of the Holy Eucharist. He points to the necessity of its being celebrated in the vulgar tongue, that the people may know when and how to make the proper responses. See the admission of Cardinal Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. v. 4.

6 Σὺ μὲν γὰρ καλῶς εὐχαριστεῖς. The emphasis rests on the prominently placed pronoun. "Thou givest thanks well; he, however, who fills the place of the unlearned is in no degree the better for it."

vi. The Custom of the Primitive Church. As regards primitive usage it is to be borne in mind that

- (α) It had nowhere been laid down before the Advent of our Lord that Hebrew was too sacred a language for translation into the vernacular tongue;
- (β) The Old Testament Scriptures had already been translated into Chaldee for the Palestinian Jews, and into Greek for those of Alexandria and of the Roman world generally;
- (γ) And as it was with the Old, so it was with the New Testament. In very early times portions of the New Testament appeared in Greek, Latin, Syriac, Coptic, Gothic and other languages¹;
- (δ) What was true with respect to the Scriptures was true also of the primitive Liturgies. The custom was that the whole congregation should join in the responses and in the singing of the Psalms and Hymns, which would have been impossible, had not the Psalms and Hymns been sung in intelligible dialects capable of being understood by the people.

vii. Testimony of the Fathers. When we turn to the statements of the early Fathers, we find:—

(a) S. Cyril<sup>3</sup> writing thus, "When the Priest says, Lift up your hearts, the people answer, We lift

Abbot, who, knowing nothing but the Egyptian language, entered a Church, and hearing the Gospel read, in which it is enjoined to sell all, straightway went and did so." Bp Forbes, Articles,

- them up unto the Lord; when the Priest says, Let us give thanks unto the Lord, the people respond, It is meet and right so to do;
- (b) Origen writes, "The Greeks use Greek in their prayers, the Romans Latin, and so every one in his own language prays to God, and gives thanks as he is able. And He that is Lord of every tongue hears that which is asked in every tongue<sup>1</sup>;"
- (c) S. Jerome tells us that at the funeral of Paula, a lady of high rank, "the Psalms were sung in Greek, Latin, and Syriac, because people speaking each of these languages were present<sup>2</sup>;"
- (d) S. Hilary speaks of people standing without the Church, and yet "able to hear the voice of the people praying within; to discern the clear sound of the hymns; and, amidst the celebration of the divine Sacraments, to distinguish the response of devout confession<sup>3</sup>."

Now all this would have been impossible, if the language used had not been intelligible to the people, and had it not been desired that the mass of the faithful should be able to attend to, and understand, the service at which they were present.

viii. The use of the Latin tongue in the services of the Western Church was not due to the fact that Latin was the original language of the Roman Church, for that Church in the earliest times used the Greek language, and not only S. Paul's Epistles to and from Rome were written

in Greek, but many extant Christian writings of the first three centuries, which appeared in Rome and in the West, were Greek or originally Greek1. Moreover in the Roman Mass itself there are still preserved indications of its Greek original. The words Kyrie Eleison are Greek, not Latin, and their occurrence in the Mass shows that it was once said in Greek. In process of time, however, Greek began to fall into disuse, and the translation of the divine offices into Latin was made for the very purpose of their being understood by the worshippers, and with the intention of obeying S. Paul's precept. Thus Latin became in its turn the language of Liturgical worship as Greek had been before, and while out of the ancient Latin grew the French, the Italian, the Spanish and other dialects, the Latin Liturgies were retained<sup>2</sup>, and gradually acquired, or were supposed to acquire, a special sanctity, and it was deemed profanation to celebrate the Mass in any other language than that of the capital of Christendom. The Eastern Church, on the other hand, did not take this exclusive line. It freely allowed the translation of the Liturgies and other Service Books, for the use of the Slavonic races3, whom it the first three centuries the Church of Rome, and most, if not all the Churches of the West, were, if we may so speak, Greek religious colonies. Their language was Greek; their Scriptures Greek; and many vestiges and traditions show that their ritual and their Liturgy was Greek." Milman's Latin Christianity, i. p. 32. "The Epistles of Clement, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, the works of Justin Martyr, down to Caius and Hippolytus, the author of the Refutation of all Heresies—all were Greek." Ibid. p. 33.

2 "As the fresh tribes from the North were evangelized by the Roman clergy, it was natural that the Roman clergy should employ and recommend the rites to which they had been accustomed. It became the measure of the solidity of the conversion that the Latin tongue was accepted. It was also a great means for the consolidation of the Church's power. Even in the Celtic tribes of Ireland and Scotland the Mass, though not the rubrics and hymns, was always in Latin; and whatever may have been the polity and nationality of the race who first raised to heaven the prayers of the Mozarabic Rite, that glorious formulary speaks to God in the language of the Romans." See Bp Forbes, p.

435. The great Slav races, who received their knowledge of Christ from the East, were freely allowed their won over to the faith. Hence we can understand why, when the Council of Trent took the course it did<sup>2</sup>, the language of the present Article was made stronger and more definite, for the craving in the Sixteenth Century for a vernacular Liturgy and Offices was a craving for what had been sanctioned in the earliest and purest ages of the Church, and in Eastern Christendom had never disappeared.

Slavonic services. The Armenians and Georgians, Copts and Syrians, were all allowed to worship God in a tongue which they understood.

When in the ninth century the Slavs were converted to the Christian faith by Methodius, Pope John VIII. highly praised their performing the service in the Slavonic tongue. He, however, added that, for the honour of divine worship, the Gospel is to be read first in Latin and then translated into the vernacular. The scruples of this Pontiff are said to have been removed by his remembering the verse in the Psalms, Praise the Lord all ye nations. This verse appeared to him decisive. It could hardly mean that the Creator's praise was to be restricted to three languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Maclear's Mediaval Missions, p. 286.

Comp. p. 289, n. It is clearly desirable that, "due precaution being taken for the conservation of the true doctrine by certain unalterable for-mulæ, the language of prayer and praise should be that which every ordinarily educated person of average intelligence should be able to follow with perfect facility; and that in the mutation of language, the servicebooks should from time to time be corrected, but only when the amount of discrepancy between the archaic and ordinary tongues has become so great, that an intelligent rational worship is rendered difficult or impossible." Bp Forbes on the Articles, p. 436. The "due precaution" of which Bishop Forbes speaks is important because the lex orandi cannot be dissociated from the lex credendi. The language of worship is always symbolic, a "form of sound words," needing the same protection as do the Creeds.

ARTICLE XXV.

De Sacramentis.

Sacramenta à Christo instituta, non tantum sunt notæ professionis Christianorum, sed certa quædam potius testimonia, et efficacia signa gratiæ atque bonæ in nos uoluntatis Dei, per quæ inuisibiliter ipse in nobis operatur, nostrámque fidem in se, non solum excitat, uerumetiam confirmat.

Duo à Christo Domino nostro in Euangelio instituta sunt Sacramenta, scilicet Baptismus et Cœna Domini.

Quinque illa uulgo nominata Sacramenta, scilicet, Confirmatio, Pœnitentia, Ordo, Matrimonium, et Extrema unctio, pro sacramentis euangelicis habenda non sunt, ut quæ partim à praua Apostolorum imitatione profluxerunt, partim uitæ status sunt in scripturis quidem probati, sed sacramentorum eandem cum baptismo et cœna Domini rationem non habentes: quomodo nec Pœnitentia, ut quæ signum aliquod uisibile seu cæremoniam a Deo institutam non habeat.

Sacramenta non in hoc instituta sunt à Christo, ut spectarentur, aut circumferrentur, sed ut ritè illis uteremur: et in hijs duntaxat qui dignè percipiunt, salutarem habent effectum: qui uero indigne percipiunt, damnationem (ut inquit Paulus) sibi ipsis acquirunt.

Of the Sacramentes.

Sacramentes ordayned of Christe, be not onely badges or tokens of Christian mens profession: but rather they be certaine sure witnesses and effectuall signes of grace and Gods good wyll towardes vs, by the which he doth worke inuisiblie in vs, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirme our fayth in hym.

There are two Sacramentes ordayned of Christe our Lorde in the Gospell, that is to say, Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lorde.

Those fyue, commonly called Sacramentes, that is to say, Confirmation, Penaunce, Orders, Matrimonie, and extreme Vnction, are not to be compted for Sacramentes of the gospel, being such as haue growen partly of the corrupt folowing of the Apostles, partly are states of life alowed in the scriptures: but yet haue not lyke nature of Sacramentes with Baptisme and the Lordes Supper, for that they haue not any visible signe or ceremonic ordayned of God.

The Sacramentes were not ordayned of Christ to be gased vpon, or to be caryed about: but that we should duely use them. And in such only, as worthyly receaue the same, they haue a wholesome effect or operation: But they that receaue them vnworthyly, purchase to them selues damnation, as S. Paul sayth.

- i. Connection. From the Church, its authority, its Ministers, and the language in which its worship should be conducted, it is a natural transition to the Sacraments, and the xxvth Article forms a general introduction to a series of Articles dealing with the subject.
- ii. Source. The Article is derived in a great measure from the Ninth of the Thirteen Articles drawn up in 15381, and that in its turn was largely taken from the Augsburg Confession of 15302.
- iii. Object. The Title of the Article has remained uniform since 1553, and its object may be described as a threefold one :-
  - (a) To protest against the Zwinglian tendency to minimize the value and efficacy of the Sacraments;
  - (β) To distinguish from the rest the Greater Sacraments necessary to every man for salvation;
  - To declare the need of right conditions on the part of the recipients.
- iv. Form and Language. The Article in its present form differs considerably from that which it presented in 1553. Then it commenced with a clause<sup>8</sup>, which has since been altogether withdrawn, and what formed the last clause in 1553 has taken its place. The present second and third clauses were introduced for the first time in 1563, while the fourth is a modification of what formed the second clause of the draft of 15531.

- v. The Word Sacrament, from the Latin Sacramentum, has passed through three stages of meaning, according to its (1) Classical, (2) Early Ecclesiastical, and (3) Later Ecclesiastical Use:-
  - (a) Its Classical Use:—

The word meant

- (I) An oath as calling down divine anger, if the swearer perjured himself2;
- The sum of money deposited with a judge<sup>3</sup> as a pledge that parties in a suit would go on with it4:
- The oath of the newly-enlisted soldier that he would be loyal to his commander.
- (B) Its Early Ecclesiastical Use:-
  - The earliest application of the word to anything Christian occurs in the celebrated letter of the younger Pliny to the Emperor Trajan, where he says of the Christians that they were wont

1 In this clause we further note the important omission, after the statement that Sacraments "in suche only, as worthelie receiue the same, haue an wholesome effecte, and operacione," of the words, "and yet not that of the woorke wrought, as some men speake, whiche worde, as it is straunge and vnknowen to holie Scripture: So it engendereth no Godlie, but a verie supersticious sense."

4 It was called Sacramentum either because (t) the money was deposited in a sacred place, Cic. in Verrem, II. i. 9, 26; or (ii) because the loser of the suit forfeited his pledge to sacred temple uses; comp. Varro, L. L. v. 36, "qui judicio vicerat, suum sacramentum e sacro auferebat, victi ad ærarium redibat."

to meet on a certain fixed day before sunrise, to sing hymns to Christ, and to bind themselves by a Sacrament not to commit any sort of wickedness<sup>1</sup>

- Testament it was used as a translation of the Greek word Μυστήριον or Mystery. Thus in I Cor. ii. 7, for we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, the Old Latin version had "dicimus Dei sapientiam in sacramento"; and in I Cor. xiii. 2, where the Apostle says though I know all mysteries, it had "si scio omnia sacramenta".
  - (3) Conformably with this use of the word in the Latin versions of the New Testament, "revealed truths" are spoken of as Sacraments, and we find such expressions as "the Sacrament of the Trinity³," "the Sacrament of the Incarnation⁴," "the Sacrament of the Passion and Resurrection⁵." Thus, again, the touching the catechumen with spittle⁶, the salt given to catechumens⁵, the Creed taught to catechumens⁵, the honey and milk given after Tertullian, again, speaking of the Christian's Baptismal vow, says that "he is called to the warfare of the living God, and makes answer to the words of the Sacrament." Tertull. ad Martyres, cap. iii.

Baptism1 to catechumens, all these, as well as Baptism<sup>2</sup> and the Holy Eucharist<sup>3</sup> itself, were spoken of as Sacraments.

(y) Its Later Ecclesiastical Use:-

The term became restricted to a rite with an external sign conferring Grace. This was the ordinary Scholastic sense and it still prevails both in the Roman and in the English Church4.

vi. Sacraments as regarded in the Article. This examination of the word "Sacrament" itself prepares us for what is said of Sacraments in the Article. It treats of them (i) negatively and (ii) positively, and lays down (i) what they are not, and (ii) what they are:

(a) Negatively:-

"Sacraments," it says, "be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession," referring to the teaching of men, who like the followers of the Zwinglian school<sup>5</sup> and the Anabaptists<sup>6</sup> minimized their efficacy and regarded them as mere empty rites, neither spiritual in themselves, nor working

1 John the Deacon says, "baptizatis

...hoc genus sacramenti offertur."

2 "Sacramentum aquæ," Tertull. de Bapt. i. 12; Ambrose, Expos. Ev. Luc. x. 48. "Sacramentum lavacri," Tertull. de Virg. Veland. ii. Confirmation was termed "Sacramentum olei," S. Aug. Serm. 227, or "uncti-onis," S. Aug. in. Ep. S. Joann. c. 2.

3 "Sacramentum Altaris," S. Aug. Serm. lix. 6; "Sacramentum Mensæ Dominicæ," Serm. 127. Cyprian applies the word Sacrament to the Trinity, and calls the Lord's Prayer a Sacrament. See Hagenbach, Hist. of Docurines, i. p. 298, E. T. Comp. "Sacramenta, id est, sacra signa." Contra Advers. Legis et Proph., Lib. ii. 33, or, as S. Augustine defines it elsewhere, "Signum rei sacrae."

4 Thomas Aquinas, Summ. Theol. iii. 60 (2). Comp. Stone, ut supr. pp. 317 f. The Catechism of the Council of Trent defines a Sacrament as "invisibilis gratiævisibile signum ad nostram justificationem institutum."

5 "Credo, immo scio, omnia sacramenta tam abesse ut gratiam conferant, ut ne adferant quidem, aut dispen-sent." Zwinglius, Fid. Ratio ad Car.

Rom. Imp. no. vii.

6 "Eodem modo sacramenta fidelibus supervacanea judicabant, aut saltem non necessaria esse, et exiguam utilitatem habere." Bullinger, Adv. Anabapt.; "Nihil omnino tribuunt Baptismo nisi quod sit Christianorum nota, qua discernuntur ab gentibus, more civili." Rogers On the Articles, p. 246, n.

anything spiritual in us. They professed to look upon them as external acts, which simply betokened a profession of the Christian faith, whereby the Christian man rather does something himself, than receives aught by means of these sacred signs.

(β) Positively:—

In opposition to this teaching the Article lays it down that Sacraments are:

- (i) "Certain sure1 witnesses, and
- (ii) "Effectual signs<sup>2</sup> of grace, and God's good will towards us,
- (iii) "By the which He
  - (a) "Doth work invisibly in us, and
  - (b) "Doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in Him."

Herein the language of the Article closely approximates to that of the Church Catechism, where a Sacrament is defined to be "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ Himself, as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof<sup>3</sup>".

They are described not merely as "quædam testimonia," but "certa quædam testimonia." Certus = (1) determined, established, estetled; (2) sure, unerring, indubitable; comp. "Certam hastam," Virg. Æn. xi. 767; "certa fides segetis," Hor. Od. i. 12, 23; "certa fides segetis," Hor. Od. iii. 16, 30. 2 "Efficacia signa," not merely "signa." "A Sacrament thus not only typifies, it conveys. It is not a bare sign, but an effectual sign, a sign that carries its effect along with it. It is the means whereby we receive the same grace, of which it is the outward visible sign." See Bp Forbes On the Articles, p. 441. Hooker, ut supr.

3 "Signum externum et visibile gratiæ internæ et spiritualis nobis collatæ, a Christo Ipso institutum, tanquam instrumentum per quod eam recipimus, et pignus quod eam nobis confirmet." The language alike of the Catechism and the Article expresses in the plainest manner the objective view of the Sacraments. They regard them as Divine Gifts which, external to the subjective attitude of the recipient, are what they are whether or not they are believed to be such. "Since the glorification of Christ, and the outpouring of His Spirit, we are presented with signs,

- vii. Material things have in all ages been used by God as signs and pledges. Thus
  - (i) The Rainbow was a sign to Noah that the world would no more be destroyed by a flood (Gen. ix. 12—17);
  - (ii) Circumcision was a sign and pledge to Abraham of the Covenant between God and himself (Gen. xvii. 9—14);
  - (iii) The Miracles Moses was bidden to perform before Pharaoh were signs and pledges of his Divine Mission (Ex. iv. 1—9);
  - (iv) The Fleece, wet while the ground around was dry, and dry while the ground around was wet, was a sign and pledge to Gideon that the Lord would give him victory in the battle against the Midianites (Judg. vi. 36—40).
  - viii. Material things, again, have been used by God as supernatural means of Grace. Thus
    - (i) When the Israelites were dying in the desert from the bites of the fiery serpents, God bade Moses set up a brazen serpent on a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he looked unto the serpent of brass, he lived (Num. xxi. 6—9);
    - (ii) When Naaman, afflicted with leprosy, came to Elisha, he was bidden to go and dip himself seven times in the Jordan, and he went, and his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child, and he was clean (2 Kings v. 10—14);

which not only speak of spiritual mysteries, but convey the things which they speak of.... If the Sacraments were what Zwingli made them, they would not be Christian. Christ could not have devised what the Article calls 'only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession.'" Mason, Faith of the Gospel, pp. 259 sqq. Ed. 1888.

- (iii) When our Lord saw a man blind from his birth, and would heal him, He spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay, and said unto him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam. He went away therefore, and washed, and came seeing (John ix. 6, 7);
- (iv) Again, when one that was deaf and had an impediment in his speech was brought unto Him, He took him aside from the multitude privately, and put His fingers into his ears, and He spat, and touched his tongue; and looking up to heaven, He sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. And his ears were opened, and the bond of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain (Mark vii. 31—35)<sup>2</sup>.

Now in Sacraments ordained by Christ all these methods of using material things are combined. For

(1) They are "sure witnesses3" (testimonia) of Grace, and God's good will towards us,

1 Ἐπέχρισεν αὐτοῦ τὸν πηλὸν ἐπὶ τοὺν ὁφθαλμούς = He spread the clay thereof upon his eyes. Physicians had applied saliva jejuna as a remedy for post-natal blindness, but congenital blindness had always been regarded as incurable, and no instance to the contrary had ever been heard of. The Great Physician, however, teaches us that ordinary means can accomplish extraordinary results at His will. Comp. Vespasian's reputed miracle, Tac. Hist. iv. 81; Sueton. Vesp. 5.

<sup>2</sup> In this miracle the use of outward signs is most diversified. Our Lord (1) takes the man aside; (2) He puts His fingers into his ears; (3) He touches his tongue with the moisture of His mouth; (4) He looks up to heaven; (5) He sighs; (6) He speaks the word Ephphatha.

3 "They are witnesses of Grace, or, in stricter theological language, they signify Grace. They are types of that holiness and righteousness which they convey." Bp Forbes, p. 440.

as compared with the Jewish Church, that in her fold shadows were transmuted to substance, symbols to means of grace, types to instruments of salvation, rituals to channels of higher powers. What was before a pious usage—an intimation, a memento, a suggestion only—was now become the medium of Divine power, and an in-

- (3) They are "pledges (pignora) of His love1";
- (4) They are appointed means (media), "by the which He doth work invisibly in us2."
- ix. The number of the Sacraments of the Gospel. Having dealt with the nature of the Sacraments, the Article proceeds to deal with the number of such as may properly be called "Sacraments of the Gospel." The word Sacrament, as we have seen, is capable of a very wide application. The Article uses it in the later Ecclesiastical sense, that in which it is used in the Catechism of the English Church. But, with that formulary, it assigns a preeminence to the two Sacraments which are "generally (i.e. for every man) necessary to salvation." Baptism and the Holy Eucharist are the only Sacraments which were expressly ordained, as to their proper form and matter, by our Lord Himself before His Ascension3. These are the chief, the principal, the special Sacraments of our salvation4.

x. The Five Lesser Sacraments. As regards the other five "commonly called" Sacraments, the Article now strument of sanctification." Döllinger, First Age of the Church, ii. p. 36.

Ed. 1877.

1 Compare the language of the Exhortation in the Communion Service, "He hath instituted and ordained holy mysteries, as pledges of His love." "A pledge to assure us of the inward and spiritual grace given to us, is a necessary part of the definition of a Sacrament." Bp Forbes,

P. 44<sup>I</sup>.
2 "All grace flows from the humanity of Christ, and the Sacraments are main channels, whereby that grace flows into the soul. Christ is the chief and principal worker in all Sacraments, as a function of His everlasting Priesthood. They work in us by means of the institution of Christ." Ibid, p. 442. "It pleases Christ, not merely to give covenanted graces along with the faithful performance of prescribed ceremonies, but to make the ceremonies quite literally the means of grace, and to charge with His own fulness the thing which His Church uses or does." Mason's Faith of the Gospel, p. 262, Ed. 1888.

4 "Principalia, præcipua, eximia salutis nostræ sacramenta," Bellarmine, de Missa. "The two Sacraments of the Gospel, as they may be emphatically termed, are the instruments of the inward life, according to our Lord's declaration that Baptism is a new birth, and that in the Eucharist we have the living Bread." Newman, On Justification, Lect. vi.

proceeds to speak of them with decision. The number of the Sacraments was first fixed at seven in the twelfth century<sup>1</sup>, and then it was received into the general teaching of the Church, not as a tradition coming down from the Apostles and the earliest times, but as the result of theological speculation. The Article does not deny that these other five, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, are holy ordinances, which, in the wider sense of the word, may be called "Sacraments" or "Mysteries<sup>2</sup>." What it does deny is that they are to be counted for "Sacraments of the Gospel<sup>3</sup>" of like nature with Baptism and the Holy Eucharist. This it does on the ground that "they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God<sup>4</sup>." Thus

- (i) Confirmation possesses an outward and visible sign, the laying on of hands, but there is no record of its actual institution by Christ Himself;
- (ii) Penance, again, including Confession and Absolution, has annexed to it the inward Grace of the Forgiveness of Sins, but it lacks any outward sign instituted and attached to it by our Lord's own words;

bach, Hist. Doct. ii. pp. 320, 321.

Bishop of Winchester, p. 21.

<sup>3</sup> Even Alexander of Hales, though he adopted the number Seven, admitted that Baptism and the Holy Eucharist alone were instituted by our Lord Himself, and S. Thomas Aquinas agrees with other theologians in regarding these two Sacraments as "potissima Sacramenta." See Summa, pt. iii. qu. 62.

4 "If a Sacrament must be defined to be 'an outward sign' ordained by God or Christ, then only Baptism and the Lord's Supper are in this sense 'Sacraments'." Bp Forbes on the Articles PD.

the Articles, pp. 449, 450.

The Homily on Common Prayer and Sacraments expressly says that Absolution has the inward grace of "the forgiveness of sins," only not by express words of the New Testament annexed and tied to the visible sign. We have traces of Penance in the Sub-Apostolic Age in the Didaché, iv. 14, Έν ἐκκλησία ἐξομολογήση τὰ παραπτώματά σου, and xiv. 1, εὐχαριστήσατε προεξομολογησάμενοι τὰ παραπτώματα ὑμῶν.

- (iii) Orders is the comprehensive term for the rites whereby men enter into the Sacred Ministry. Both the outward sign and the inward gift are named by S. Paul, when he bids Timothy stir up the gift of God, which is in him through the laying on of the Apostle's hands (2 Tim. i. 6). But though it is a "state of life allowed in the Scriptures," we have no account of any express institution by Christ Himself of imposition of hands as its outward sign;
- (iv) Marriage is a "state of life allowed in the Scriptures"," but it is not of universal obligation, and, though it is a "mystery," it possesses no outward sign expressly ordained by God or Christ";
- (v) Extreme<sup>4</sup> Unction of the sick, restricted in its use to occasions when death is imminent, grew up out of "the corrupt following" or imitation of the Apostles, who anointed the sick with oil<sup>5</sup> with a view to their recovery as well

<sup>2</sup> The words "quae partim...in scripturis quidem probati" are not intended to divide exactly the five Sacraments in question, but simply to suggest in general terms how they came to be what in actual use they were when the Article was written.

5 Anointing with oil for medicinal purposes played an important part in early times, especially in the East. The prophet Isaiah alludes to its use as an ointment for mollifying wounds (Isai. i. 6); the good Samaritan is described as pouring oil and wine on the wounds of the man who fell among thieves (Luke x. 34); the Apostles are expressly recorded to have employed it for the purpose of healing (Mark vi. 13); and we find its Sacramental use in S. James v. 14 where we read, Is any among you sick? Let him call for the elders of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save him that is sick, and the Lord will raise him up, and if he have committed any sins, it shall be physical as spiritual, but they are nowhere recorded to have treated it exclusively as a Sacrament for the dying1.

Thus it is clear that however properly these five Rites may be regarded as Sacramental, they naturally have not in the life of every Christian the importance of the two "Sacraments of the Gospel," nor are they held to be of equal dignity with them2.

xi. The Right Use of the Sacraments. The last paragraph of the Article lays it down that the purpose of Christ in ordaining the Sacraments was not that they should be "gazed upon" or "carried about." The words refer to ceremonies which suggested that the worship of our Lord as present under the forms of Bread and Wine was a primary purpose in the institution of the Eucharist3. For such ceremonies, whatever may be their ecclesiastical authority, there is no warrant in Scripture, or in the custom of the Primitive Church. The Article states that on the contrary Sacraments were ordained "that we should duly use them," and that "in such only as forgiven him. Here the sick man is evidently contemplated as likely to recover, and prayer and Unction are to be used as a means towards that recovery, as well as towards his spiritual aid. Hence in the Greek Church Unction is so used now, and in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. it was allowed if the sick man should desire it.

1 The Article does not intend to depreciate Holy Unction of the Sick, but, first, to assign to it its proper position as compared with the "potissima sacramenta," and, next, to indicate that its contemporary use was not in strict accordance with its original institution. With regard to such Unction it may be observed: (i) that, although suggested by common Eastern usage, it was actually distinct from the gift of healing, which was not confined to the Elders, and had its own special accompanying sign, the laying on of hands (Mark xvi. 18): (ii) that its special accompaniment was prayer, and its result (provided there were faith and repentance) consolation and forgiveness, sometimes physical recovery or relief. Döllinger, First Age of the Church, ii. 42, sqq. E. T. Ed. 1877.

worthily receive them have they a wholesome effect or operation." This is intended as a caution against the doctrine that Sacraments justify mechanically, so to speak, through the mere performance of them, irrespective of the faith of the recipient1. This the Article repudiates, and quotes in corroboration the stern words of S. Paul concerning profane recipients of the Holy Eucharist in the Church of Corinth. The Apostle writes respecting the disorderly mode of reception to which they were addicted: he that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgement2 unto himself, if he discern not the Body (I Cor. xi. 29), and he goes on to say that this was proved by the fact that many of the members of the Church were weak and sickly, and not a few had slept the sleep of death. S. Paul thus clearly contemplates a proper and improper mode of approaching the Holy Sacrament, and the legitimate induction from his words supports the statement of the Article as to the necessity of a worthy reception of all holy mysteries, if they are to exercise "a wholesome effect or operation."

1 S. Augustine, balancing with sound judgment the objective and the subjective, distinguishes in a Sacrament (i) The Sacramentum or Material Sign; (ii) The Res Sacramenti, or Spiritual Grace; (iii) The Virtus Sacramenti, or "wholesome effect or operation." The two former have their objective reality quite independently of the recipient. But the Virtus Sacramenti, or "salutary effect," is wrought out only in such as worthily receive this holy mystery. In other words while a Sacrament confers Grace ex opere operato, i.e. by virtue of the Gift of God, who originates it, it has not its salutary effect ex opere operato, for that effect depends (in part), not upon mere physical reception, but upon human moral correspondence. In the Divine purpose, a Sacrament is a moral and not a physical instrument. Hence S. Paul exhorts the Corinthians that they receive not the grace of God in vain (2 Cor. vi. 1), and in another place testifies that God's grace which was bestowed upon him was not found in vain (1 Cor. xv. 10).

i. Connection. If the Sacraments are "not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession," but "sure witnesses, and effectual signs of grace," the important question arises, "Does their efficacy depend on the worthiness of him who ministers them"? It is to this question that the Article, which we have now to consider, contains an answer.

ii. Object. It was necessary to give an answer to it, for not a few in the sixteenth century made the validity of the Sacraments depend on the worthiness of those who ministered them, and some Anabaptists declined to come to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist on the ground of the questionable lives of those who celebrated at the altar2. This, however, was only a revival of early errors, for the Novatians ascribed the efficacy of the Sacraments to the character of the Minister, and the Donatists3 refused to recognise the Ordination of Cæcilian by Felix of Apthonga on the ground that he had during persecution delivered up the sacred books and vessels. These ideas were revived again and again during the Middle Ages in consequence of the corrupt lives of many ecclesiastics, and were held by the adherents of Arnold of Brescia, the Vaudois and the less informed followers of Wiclif and Husss.

iii. Origin. In its original shape the present Article formed the conclusion of the Fifth of the Thirteen Articles of 1538, and is expressed almost in the selfsame words. The Fifth of these Thirteen Articles in its turn derived at secrate the Eucharist, and that the transubstantiation took place not in the hand of the unworthy celebrator, but in the mouth of the worthy communicant; that a bad priest could not absolve; that it was better to confess to a pious laic than to a wicked clergyman." Bp Forbes, On the Articles, p. 480.

Their views led at the time of the Reformation to the idea not that the beneficial effect only, but the reality also of the Sacrament depended on the interior disposition, and the faith of him to whom the Sacrament was administered.

least some expressions from the Sixth and Seventh of the Augsburg series, though in other respects it departed considerably from that confession.

- iv. Analysis. The Article lays down the following propositions:—That
  - (α) The Sacraments have an objective value as being Christ's ordinances, and not man's; that they are efficacious because they are the works of God, opera operata, not the works of the Minister, opera operantis; for
  - (β) The Clergy, who minister them, do so, not in their own name, but in the name of Christ;
  - (γ) "The Grace of God's gifts" is not "diminished from such as by faith and rightly do receive the Sacraments ministered unto them; which be effectual, because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men<sup>2</sup>";
  - (δ) Nevertheless the exercise of godly discipline as regards evil Ministers is an absolute duty on the part of the Church, which she cannot put aside.
- v. The Teaching of Holy Scripture in reference to the above points is quite clear. Our Lord Himself, the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls (I Pet. ii. 25), laid it of 1538 runs, "Et quamvis in Ecclesia ...mali sint bonis admixti, atque etiam ministeriis verbi et sacramentorum nonnunquam prasint; tamen cum ministrent non suo sed Christi nomine, mandato, et auctoritate, licet eorum ministerio uti, tam in verbo audiendo quam in recipiendis sacramentis, juxta illud: 'Qui vos audit, me audit.' Nec per corum malitiam minuitur effectus, aut gratia donorum Christi rite accipientibus; sunt enim efficacia propter promissionem et ordinationem Christi, etiamsi per malos exhibeantur." Hardwick, Hist. Art. p. 264. Ed. 1859.

down again and again that in the visible Church the evil would ever be mingled with the good. He warned His Apostles that the tares would be mixed with the wheat (Matt. xiii. 30), the sheep with the goats (Matt. xxv. 32), the good fish with the bad (Matt. xiii. 47, 48), the good grain with the chaff (Matt. iii. 12), the fruitful with the unfruitful branches of the vine (John xv. 1 sqq.). To expect therefore perfection of the Ministers of Christ's Sacraments is to expect what cannot be realized in this mortal life2, and no care and pains will infallibly prevent evil and depraved men from joining the most holy societies. Moreover our Lord Himself bade His disciples do whatever the Scribes and Pharisees bade them, not because they were themselves good men, but because they sat in Moses's seat (Matt. xxiii. 2, 3), and thus held an acknowledged official position, and He Himself had to bear with a Judas amongst His own Apostles. But as no one would be justified in refusing to accept Apostolic doctrine because one traitor was found in the original Apostolic College, so to reject the Sacraments because of the personal shortcoming of the Minister thereof, would be to acknowledge that they did minister in their own name, and not by Christ's institution, commission, and authority, and to introduce disastrous confusion. In direct opposition to this the Apostles teach not that holiness in the Minister, but that God's blessing on his Ministry, is the cause of blessing to the Church and to human souls. They remind their <sup>1</sup> S. Paul also compares the Church to a great house, in which are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth, and some unto konour, and some unto dishonour (2 Tim. ii. 20).

2 "God sometimes works," writes
S. Chrysostom, "even by those who are unworthy; nor is the Grace of converts that Paul may plant and Apollos water<sup>1</sup>, but it is God that giveth the increase (I Cor. iii. 6, 7), and that, great and glorious as is the Christian Ministry, yet the treasure is in earthen vessels, to the intent that the greatness of the power may be of God and not of men<sup>2</sup> (2 Cor. iv. 7).

vi. Ecclesiastical Discipline. Still, while the Article has a side of comfort3, for it would indeed be overwhelming if the validity of the Sacraments were to depend upon the personal character of the Minister, yet it has also a side of warning as to the necessity of seeing that those, who minister in holy things, be themselves men of holiness, and as to the need of godly discipline to secure this end. The Scripture testimony on this point is unmistakeable. (a) The Old Testament teaches us that even under a typical Dispensation the Lord would be sanctified in them that come nigh Him (Lev. x. 3), and would have His priests clothed with righteousness (Ps. cxxxii. 9), and the judgments which fell upon two of the sons of Aaron (Lev. x. 1, 2) for offering strange fire before the Lord, and on the sons of Eli for their immoral living (1 Sam. iv. 10, 11), attest the purity of life required of those who ministered to the Lord in holy things even under the Old Covenant.  $(\beta)$  Similarly the New Testament gives special instructions as regards the discipline of the Clergy, and S. Paul in the Pastoral Epistles enforces stringent rules as to laying hands hastily on no

He also directs that, while Timothy must not rashly receive an accusation against an elder, yet he must reprove in the sight of all, them that sin2, that the rest also may be in fear (I Tim. v. 19, 20), and thus exercise that ecclesiastical discipline, which all ages of the Church have acknowledged to be part of her duty.

vii. The Doctrine of Intention. As regards the doctrine laid down by the Council of Trent that on the part of the Minister of any Sacrament "there is required the intention at least of doing what the Church does," it will be sufficient to quote the words of Hooker. "What a man's private mind is," he writes, "as we cannot know, so neither are we bound to examine; therefore always in these cases the known intent of the Church generally doth suffice, and where the contrary is not manifest, we may presume that he which outwardly doth the work, hath inwardly the purpose of the Church of God4." The "known intent" of the English Church to do what the Church does is plain from the words of the preface to our services of Ordination<sup>5</sup>. Where we have the external conditions of validity for a Sacrament<sup>6</sup>, a right form and matter, and

Pol. v. 58, 3. <sup>5</sup> "And therefore, to the intent that these orders (the old orders of the Church, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons) may be continued, and reverently used and esteemed in the Church of England," the English Church provided a proper Minister, and a proper rite, valid in "matter and form." See below under Article xxxvi.

<sup>6</sup> Canon Estcourt allows that "the intention requisite for the valid administration of a sacrament is the 'intentio generalis faciendi quod facit Ecclesia'." Question of Anglican Ordinations discussed, p. 109; see Gore, Rom. Cath. Claims, p. 156 and Schouppe, Elem. Theol. Dogm. x. 113.

Minister, there "no spiritual disqualification, whether in understanding or morals, on the part of the administrator, is a bar to the validity of the rite, and this because of the great principle that the giver of the grace is not the minister, but the Holy Spirit1." To go beyond the known intent of the Church, and to enquire into the Minister's private mind, is, in the words of Bishop Jewel, to venture into "the very dungeon of uncertainty," an uncertainty which would make all Orders and all Sacraments precarious. We may well be content with the dictum of S. Thomas Aquinas himself<sup>3</sup>, when he says, "The Minister of a Sacrament acts as the representative (in persona) of the whole Church of which he is the Minister: in the words which he utters the intention of the Church is expressed, which suffices for the perfection of a Sacrament, unless the contrary be expressed outwardly on the part of the Minister, or the recipient of the Sacrament4."

Of Baptisme.

Baptismus non est tantum professionis signum ac discriminis nota, qua Christiani à non Christianis discernantur, sed etiam est signum Regenerationis, per quod tanquam per instrumentum rectè baptismum suspitientes <sup>1</sup>, ecclesiæ inseruntur, promissiones de Remissione peccatorum atque Adoptione nostra in filios Dei, per Spiritum sanctum uisibiliter obsignantur, fides confirmatur, et ui diuinæ inuocationis, gratia augetur.

Baptismus paruulorum omnino in ecclesia retinendus est, ut qui cum Christi institutione optimè congruat. Baptisme is not only a signe of profession, and marke of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from other that be not christened: but is also a signe of regeneration or newe byrth, whereby as by an instrument, they that receaue baptisme rightly, are grafted into the Churche: the promises of the forgeuenesse of sinne, and of our adoption to be the sonnes of God, by the holy ghost, are visibly signed and sealed: fayth is confyrmed: and grace increased by vertue of prayer vnto God. The baptisme of young children is in any wyse to be retayned in the Churche, as most agreeable with the institution of Christe.

- i. Connection. Having spoken of the Sacraments generally the Articles proceed to treat of them particularly and separately, and first they deal with Holy Baptism.
- ii. Source. It is difficult to find any exact model, on which the xxviith Article is framed. It bears but little resemblance to any Article in any other Confession, either English or foreign, though a few expressions may be traced to the Sixth of the Thirteen Articles of 1538.

iii. Object. The Pelagian tendency of the Anabaptists led them to deny the necessity of Holy Baptism. With them, as with John à Lasco, it was an "obsignaculum," or professional badge, of the Christian Society, not a "medium salutis'." They repudiated Infant Baptism altogether<sup>2</sup>. There are traces in the Reformatio of a strange superstition, amongst extremists on the other side, to the effect that the Holy Ghost is united, in a quasiphysical manner, to the water of Baptism<sup>3</sup>. Possibly the compilers intended to condemn this notion also.

iv. Analysis. The Article states that Baptism

- (I) "Is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from other that be not christened4;
- (2) But it is also a sign of Regeneration<sup>5</sup> or new Birth, whereby, as by an instrument<sup>6</sup>,

- The promises of the forgiveness of sin, and of  $(\beta)$ our adoption to be the sons of God, by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed2:
- (γ) Faith is confirmed:
- And Grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God8"

v. Infant Baptism. Having stated thus much concerning Baptism generally, the Article proceeds to speak of Infant Baptism. And here it differs considerably from the original draft of 1553. Then the clause ran, "The custome of the Church to christen yonge children, is to bee commended, and in any wise to be reteined in the Churchet." This clause is less forcible than that of 1563. The increase of Pelagian teaching called for an unequivocal statement upon this matter. "The Baptism of young children," ran the amended clause, "is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ."

1 "Ecclesiæ inseruntur." Inserere is the technical word for (1) sowing or planting in a place; (2) grafting. It is constructed sometimes with in and the accusative, as "in pyrum and the accusative, as "in pyrum sylvaticam pyrum bonam inserere," Varro R. R., i. 40, 5; sometimes with the ablative, "cortice virgam inserit." Ov. Met. xiv. 630. For the imagery see Rom. xi. 17 ff. Quod si aliqui ex ramis fracti sunt, tu autem cum oleaster esses, insertus es in illis. Vulg.

3 "Ui diuinæ inuocationis." The words seem rather to mean "by virtue of the invocation of the Divine Name," that Triune Name, which is invoked in Baptism and by our Lord's express command forms an essential part of the Baptismal Formula.

4 "Mos Ecclesiæ baptizandi parvulos et laudandus est et ômnino in Ecclesia retinendus." The Reformatio Legum, "de Hæresibus," c. 18, reads "crudelis illorum impietas in baptismum irruit, quem infantibus impertiri nolunt, sed omnino nulla ratione."

vi. The Use of Water for ceremonial purification has been familiar to all nations from the earliest times. With the Egyptians<sup>1</sup>, the Greeks, and the Romans, solemn ablutions formed a necessary preliminary to all acts of devotion, especially prayer<sup>2</sup> and sacrifice<sup>3</sup>, and were essential to the removal of all ceremonial pollution, and of the guilt of homicide4, whether intentional or accidental.

vii. Amongst the Jews similar lustrations were equally frequent. We find this again and again, as when Jacob was returning from Padanaram to Palestine (Gen. xxxv. 2); when the Jewish people were about to receive the Law on Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 10); when Aaron and his sons were consecrated to their office (Exod. xxix. 4); when Joshua was about to lead the host across the Jordan (Jos. iii. 5); when Solomon dedicated the Temple (2 Chron. iv. 2-6).

viii. The Baptism of Proselytes. At a later period these divers washings (Heb. ix. 10) were considerably multiplied. They preceded all great religious observances. They accompanied all meals, and many of the most ordinary avocations of daily life (Mark vii. 3, 4). Moreover by Baptism, Circumcision and Sacrifice, was sealed the covenant with God, into which by birth every Israelite entered. Whenever a Gentile would belong to the commonwealth of Israel, and so take the yoke of the Law upon him, Baptism was one of the essential ceremonies. Thus it was an accepted axiom, "No man is a proselyte until he be circumcised and baptized1."

ix. The Baptism of John?. Hence when John the Baptist came to announce the Advent of the Messiah, and demanded that the Chosen People themselves should submit to his Baptism, if they would have a place in the Kingdom of Heaven, the Jews were not astonished at this. as though it was something unintelligible. It was a common saying with them that the sins of Israel delayed the coming of the Messiah, while their repentance would hasten it. Consequently Ferusalem, and all Judæa, and all the region round about Fordan (Matt. iii. 5) flocked forth to John, and were baptized of him after public confession of sin<sup>3</sup> (Mark i. 5).

x. The Baptism of our Lord. The Baptism of John was in the strictest sense of the word preparatory. It possessed an outward and visible sign of a life-giving change, but the inward spiritual Grace in the fullest sense of the term was reserved for Christian Baptism. For Christ too adopted the ancient custom, but He enriched it with a new significance and a still mightier efficacy. First of all He Himself submitted to the Baptismal Rite4 in the generation; and persons who had received it were baptized, if they became Christians, with the distinctively Christian Baptism. Comp. Luke iii. 3; Tit. iii. 5; Acts xix. 1--7; and see Döllinger, First Age of the

Thirdly, He directed that with the same element the Apostles should also everywhere baptize, and so admit the Gentiles and converts from Judaism into the Covenant of Grace, just as proselytes were admitted into the Mosaic Covenant (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20).

xi. Apostolic Baptism. What Christ directed and solemnly enforced just before His Ascension (Matt. xxviii. 19) the Apostles practised. Thus (1) On the day of Pentecost S. Peter admitted upwards of three thousand of his countrymen to the Sacrament of Baptism<sup>2</sup> (Acts ii. 38—41): (2) Philip the Deacon baptized the Samaritans (Acts viii. 13, 16), and afterwards the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii. 38); (3) Saul the persecutor, though miraculously converted, was baptized by Ananias (Acts ix. 18); (4) as Paul the Apostle he baptized Lydia and her household (Acts xvi. 15), the Philippian jailor and his household (Acts xvi. 33), as also several converts at Corinth (Acts xviii. 8), sometimes doing so by his own hand, sometimes by the hands of others (I Cor. i. 14). From that day to this Holy Baptism has been universally retained in the Christian Church, and it is plain that in primitive times it was not regarded as "a mere sign or badge." but as an actual means of

xii. The Grace of Holy Baptism. "Every man," as we have seen above<sup>2</sup>, "that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam," suffers from the original "fault and corruption" of his nature. He is "very far gone from original righteousness," and being born in sin cannot in his natural condition see the kingdom of God<sup>3</sup> (John iii. 3). For entrance into this Kingdom it is necessary that he be born again or anew<sup>4</sup>, that he be born of water and the Spirit (John iii. 3, 5). Of this new birth, this translation from a state of nature into a state of Grace, Baptism is the ordained instrument. As the Jew was in the order of nature born into the Old Covenant, so the Christian is in the order of Grace born again into the New and better Covenant, which God has ratified with the whole world in the Blood of the Mediator, Jesus Christ. "They that receive Baptism rightly1" are new-born, i.e. they "are grafted into the Church," which is Christ's "mystical Body?," and are made "members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven." As members of Christ they have assured to them privileges which "by nature they cannot have." God of His bounteous mercy signs and seals to them the promise of (i) the forgiveness of their sins3; (ii) the assistance of the Holy Spirit4; and (iii) if they do not forfeit it, of eternal life.

<sup>2</sup> "Baptism is a Sacrament that God hath instituted in His Church, to the end that they which receive the same might thereby be incorporated into Christ, and so through His most precious merit obtain as well that saving grace of imputation which taketh away all former guiltiness, as also that infused Divine virtue of the Holy Ghost, which giveth to the powers of the soul their first disposition towards future newness of life." Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. 60, 2. "Admission into Christ is the great gift of Baptism. All Christians are agreed that Baptism is the act by which we are visibly incorporated into the historical Church. But if the historical Church is what we have already seen it to be, in no merely figurative sense, the Body of Christ, then incorporation into it must carry the blessing of membership in Christ ... To the mind of S. Paul, inspired by the Holy Ghost, union with Christ was infinitely more than a metaphor. It did not mean to him an agreement with the principles of Christ, or sympathetic intercourse with His Person. It meant, literally, a participation in His very self." <sup>3</sup> Compare the words of S. Peter to the multitudes on the day of Pentecost, "Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins" (Acts ii. 38); as also the words of Ananias to Saul of Tarsus, "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins" (Acts xxii. 16). The clause in the Nicene Creed, "I acknowledge one Baptism for the remission of sins, explicitly connects the forgiveness of sins with Baptism. The Apostles' Creed does so by implication, when it names "the forgiveness of sins" as the first consequence of membership of the Holy Catholic Church.

4 Compare again S. Peter's words, "Repent ye, and be baptized.....and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost" (Acts ii. 38), and see Acts xix.

5 "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mark xvi. 16), and salvation, in its ultimate stage, implies eternal life.

xiii. Regeneration. The Jews, as we have seen, were wont to speak of a proselyte as "one new born," as "one born into a new world"." But with infinitely greater truth may the term be applied to one baptized into the Christian Church. For whereas by nature we were born in sin and made liable to all its consequences, we are by Baptism translated from our natural state into a higher state altogether. By this laver of regeneration2 (Tit. iii. 5)

1 "The Gentile that is made a proselyte, and the servant that is made free, behold, he is like a child new-born." "If any man become a proselyte, he is like a child new-born." Lightfoot Hor. Heb. on John iii. 3; Waterland, Works, iv., p. 429; Wall on Infant Baptism, Introd., p. 95.

Plutarch applies it to the (a) transmigration of souls, to their being born again "into a new world";

(6) Marcus Antoninus applies it to the revival of nature in spring time from its winter sleep, την περιοδικήν παλιγγενεσίαν των όλων, Marc. Anton. Meditations, xi. 1;

(c) Cicero in a letter to Atticus applies it to his restoration from exile to the dignities and honours of life at Rome, Ad Att. vi. 6, "hanc παλιγγενεσίαν nostram";

Again, Josephus characterizes the restoration of (d) the Jewish nation after the captivity, as την ἀνάκτησιν καὶ παλιγγενεσίαν της πατρίδος, Antiq. xi. 3, 9. Comp. also Plautus Captivi, iv. 2, 111, "Dilimmortales! iterum natus videor, si vera autumas." See Wet-stein on S. Matt. xix. 28. With this sense of renewal, revival, restoration, the word passes into the writings of the New Testament, and there it occurs twice, and twice only-

(a) In S. Matthew we read how, in reply to a question of S. Peter, our Lord said, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration  $(\pi \alpha \lambda \iota \gamma \gamma \epsilon \nu \epsilon \sigma \iota \alpha)$ , when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix.

(B) In Titus iii. 5 S. Paul says that God saved us through the laver of regeneration (διά λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας).

In the former of these passages the word denotes the new birth of the whole creation, the άποκατάστασις πάντων, the restoration of all things at the last day (comp. Acts iii. 21); in the latter it denotes in a narrower and more restricted sense the new birth, not of the whole creation, but of a single soul, "the free act of God's mercy and power, whereby He translates the sinner out of the kingdom of darkness into that of light, out of the state of nature into a state of grace." See Trench, Synonyms, p. 72, Ed. 1855. See also Tertullian, De Bapt. c. v. we are born afresh into the Church and Family of God; and we have His gracious promises signed and sealed to us. The corruption of our mortal nature is buried, as it were, with Christ through baptism into death (Rom. vi. 4), and by virtue of His Resurrection, the first germ of Covenant Grace is given unto us "to be newly formed unto a new life, and to obey the righteousness of God." Thus the baptized, whether infant or adult, by virtue of membership with Christ is born afresh into a new relationship other than any that nature could have bestowed. He is brought into a position, wherein he not only enjoys "the everlasting benediction of God's heavenly washing," but is by adoption and Grace made partaker of Christ's Sonship, and an inheritor of eternal life.

xiv. Infant Baptism. The last clause of the Article is concerned with the Baptism of infants. This it affirms is "in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ." It is true that those of whom we read in the New Testament as being baptized were for the most part adults, who had come to years of discretion, and therefore could not only promise repentance and faith, but also perform and keep that promise. But if "we regard Baptism as a holy cleansing, we cannot think any age superfluous for infants, considering how the human heart from the outset contains the germs of sin, however undeveloped." The arguments that may be advanced in favour of Infant Baptism are many and various, but for practical purposes they may be grouped under four heads: (i) The analogy of the Jewish Covenant<sup>2</sup>:

mer was sealed by Circumcision, into the latter it is sealed by Confirmation. We understand Col. ii. 11, if we remember that then Confirmation immediately followed Baptism, as its necessary complement.

- (ii) The teaching of our Lord; (iii) Apostolic custom; (iv) Primitive practice.
- xv. Analogy of the Jewish Covenant. Under the Tewish Covenant we find God distinctly commanding every male among the Jews to be circumcised (Gen. xvii, 10-14). and accordingly Jewish children were circumcised on the eighth day after birth (Levit. xii, 3). Under the same Dispensation we also find Moses engaging not only their heads, their tribes, their elders, and their officers, even all the men of Israel, but also their little ones, that they shall enter into the covenant of the Lord their God (Deut. xxix. 10-12), and enjoining that at the Feast of Tabernacles, and in the solemnity of the year of release, not only the men and women, but the little ones should be gathered together that they might observe to do all the words of the law<sup>1</sup> (Deut. xxxi. 12). If we remember that Circumcision simply ratified the fact that every Jew was by birth within the Old Covenant, we shall hardly find it unreasonable that children of the tenderest years should be brought within the New Covenant2.

xvi. The Teaching of our Lord. And, so far from revealing otherwise to us, God's Blessed Son, Who is the Angel of the Covenant, when He was incarnate here on earth showed in a very special manner that children were the objects of His care and love. For on one occasion, when His disciples would have kept back certain children, who had been brought to Him by their mothers to receive His blessing<sup>$$</sup> (Matt. xix. 13), He blamed<sup>4</sup> them

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Sith it is certain that the grace of God is both more plentifully found and more clearly declared in the Gospel by Christ, than at that time it was in the Old Testament by Moses, it were a greater indignity if the same grace should now be thought to be either obscurer or in any part abated." Noell's Catechism, p. 209. Ed. Parker Society.

severely for their interference; He took the children in His arms1, and blessed them, laying His hands upon them (Mark x. 16). And if the "outward gesture and deed" of Him, whose slightest act was full of hidden meaning, be not enough, His words are decisive, for He proceeded to say, Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xix. 14).

xvii. Apostolic Custom. Moreover, though there is no express mention in the New Testament of the Baptism of infants as such<sup>2</sup>, yet we find S. Peter declaring to his hearers on the day of Pentecost that the promise of the Holy Ghost was to them...and to their children (Acts ii. 39); we find S. Paul speaking of the children of his Corinthian converts as holy (1 Cor. vii. 14)8; we find him baptizing Lydia and her household at Philippi (Acts xvi. 15), the gaoler and all his at the same place (Acts xvi. 33), as also the household of Stephanas at Corinth (I Cor. i. 16), and it is difficult to believe that these families and households included no children xviii. The Practice of the Primitive Church. Though, however, there is no express mention of Infant Baptism in the New Testament, we have every reason to was much displeased. The word expresses extreme indignation. It occurs three times in S. Matthew, xx. 24, xxi. 15, xxvi. 8; twice in S. Mark, x. 41, xiv. 4; and once in S. Luke, xiii. 14, but is not found in S. John. "The only time this strong word is used of our Lord," Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. p. 336.

1 Έναγκαλισάμενος αὐτὰ (Mark x. 16), even as He Himself had been taken into the arms (είς τὰς ἀγκάλας) of the aged Symeon, Luke ii. 28. The verb is only used by S. Mark here and in ix. 36.

of all nations (Matt. xxviii. 19), He was addressing persons who had been accustomed to enrol in the Jewish Church their own infants and proselytes of all ages, and who, unless expressly forbidden, would naturally interpret His words as implying that the practice was according to His will." Abp Whately on the Sacraments, p. 34.

<sup>3</sup> S. Paul's assumption that sanctification is conferred upon children by even one Christian parent is, though indirect, perhaps the strongest evidence to be found in the Apostolic writings of the contemporary practice of Infant Baptism. Comp. Döllinger, First Age of the Church, ii. 185 sq. believe that it prevailed from the most primitive times. S. Irenæus, who was born probably in the year A.D. 97, and who sat at the feet of S. Polycarp, the disciple of S. John, says that our Lord came into the world in order that "through Himself He might save all men, infants, and little ones, and children, and youths, and elders, even all who through Him are born again unto God1." S. Justin Martyr, writing his First Apology, about A.D. 139, mentions persons who had been made disciples to Christ while children2. Tertullian, again, who was of full age before the death of Irenæus, gives absolutely conclusive proof that the Baptism of infants was a common practice of the Church in his own times. Origen, who was born probably in the year A.D. 186, and was a disciple of the famous S. Clement of Alexandria4, argues that infants must have original sin, asks why else they are baptized, and goes on to affirm that the Church received from the Apostles the tradition to administer Infant Baptism. S. Cyprian asserts of a Council of sixty-six Bishops, held A.D. 252, that they had decided that the Baptism of infants ought not to be delayed beyond the second or third day after birth.

xix. Conclusion. Thus the analogy of the Jewish Covenant, our Lord's words<sup>1</sup>, Apostolic custom, and primitive antiquity alike, tend not only to remove all doubt as to the propriety of admitting infants to Holy Baptism, but to make us earnestly believe that our Heavenly Father will "embrace them with the arms of His mercy; that He will give unto them the blessing of eternal life, and make them partakers of His everlasting Kingdom<sup>2</sup>."

Of the Lordes Supper.

The Supper of the Lord is not only a signe of the loue that Christians ought to haue among them selues one to another: but rather it is a Sacrament of our redemption by Christes death. Insomuch that to suche as ryghtlie, worthyly, and with fayth receaue the same the bread whiche we breake is a parttakyng of the body of Christe, and likewyse the cuppe of blessing is a parttakyng of the blood of Christe.

Transubstantiation (or the chaunge of the substanunce of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lorde, can not be proued by holye writ, but is repugnaunt to the playne wordes of scripture, ouerthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, and hath geuen occasion to many superstitions.

The body of Christe is geuen, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after an heauenly and spirituall maner: And the meane whereby the body of Christe is receaued and eaten in the Supper, is fayth.

The Sacrament of the Lordes Supper was not by Christes ordinaunce reserued, caryed about, lyfted vp, or worshipped.

i. Connection and Title. From Holy Baptism we naturally pass on to the second of the two Sacraments of the Gospel, the Holy Eucharist. The title of the xxviiith

Article, which treats of this subject, has never varied since the first draft.

- ii. The Form and Language of the Article, however, differ in several respects from the shape in which it originally appeared. As we have it now, it consists of four clauses. The first and second of these are the same as in the draft of 1553, save that the expression, "overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament<sup>1</sup>" was then wanting<sup>2</sup>. The third clause was a new one composed in 1563<sup>3</sup>, and took the place of a long paragraph<sup>4</sup>, which was withdrawn as suggestive of interpretations favourable to the school of Zwingli, and savouring of his tenets. The fourth clause remains as originally drafted.
  - iii. The Object of the Article is twofold. It repudiates
    - (i) The errors of the Zwinglian School, which taught that the Eucharist was merely "a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one towards another";
    - (ii) The Scholastic doctrine of the transubstantiation of the Eucharistic Elements by consecration.
  - iv. Analysis. Like the preceding Article it begins

Hardwick, Hist. Art., p. 130. Ed.

3 It was added on the motion of Bishop Guest, as is proved by a letter found amongst the State Papers from Guest to Cecil, Dec. 22, 1566. See below, p. 343.

4 The paragraph which was withdrawn ran: "Quum naturæ humanæ veritas requirat, ut unius ejusdemque hominis corpus in multis locissimul esse non posset, sed in uno aliquo et definito loco esse oporteat, idcirco Christi corpus, in multis et diversis locis, eodem tempore, præsens esse non potest. Et quoniam, ut tradunt Sacræ literæ, Christus in Cœlum fuit sublatus, et ibi usque ad finem sæculi est permansurus, non debet quisquam fidelium carnis ejus et sanguinis Realem et Corporalem (ut loquuntur) præsentiam in Eucharistia vel credere vel profiteri."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Sacramenti naturam euertit." The phrase, however, was not new. We find its equivalent "a natura sacramenti discrepat" in the Reform. Legum, De Hæres., c. 19. Again, in the "Declaration of Christian Doctrine," drawn up in 1559, we have the same thought: "So dothe it utterly denye the nature of a sacrament."

with negativing the low conceptions of the Sacrament entertained by some, and

- (i) Lays down (a) negatively, and (b) positively, what is the true import of Holy Communion;
- (ii) It condemns the Scholastic doctrine of the transubstantiation of the Elements;
- (iii) It sets forth the Catholic doctrine of the Real Presence;
- (iv) It enters a caution against ceremonies which tend to obscure the primary purpose for which the Sacrament was instituted.
- v. The Account of the Institution of the Holy Eucharist is itself sufficient to remove a low conception of its nature and object. It comes to us from three Evangelists and from the Apostle Paul. Our earliest authority is the great Apostle of the Gentiles, who in the year A.D. 57 reminds the Church of Corinth of what he had himself told them respecting the institution of the Holy Eucharist, even as he had received it by direct revelation from Christ, his Ascended Lord<sup>2</sup> (I Cor. xi. 23). Combining the narratives together we learn that
  - (α) The Holy Eucharist was instituted by our Lord on the eve of His Passion in an upper room at Jerusalem, during a Paschal Meal, for which He Himself had made special preparation, and head to give the readers an assurance of the truth of the narrative. This is what I hold, I from a good source, from the Lord Himself... If the account of the Institution of the Supper really came to Paul from the Lord, it could only be in the way of direct revelation," Godet on I Cor. xi. 23.

<sup>2</sup> Έγὼ γὰρ παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου δ καὶ παρέδωκα ὑμῖν. The Apostle establishes on an immoveable foundation the authority of his narrative. "It comes from the Lord, and without any other middle party than the Apostle himself. The ἐγὼ, 'I,' is put at the respecting which He had given the most minute instructions to His Apostles1;

- As part of the ceremonial of the Passover, it was the custom for each household to partake of, amongst other things prescribed, some flat unleavened Passover cakes, while four cups of red wine mingled with water were handed round at different stages of the feast2;
- On this occasion our Lord on reaching the upper room took the place of Celebrant, or Proclaimer of the Feast, and as the solemn meal proceeded, while we read nothing of any Paschal lamb being eaten, He took one of the unleavened cakes, that had been placed before Him, and, after giving thanks, He brake it, and then gave it to His Apostles, saying, Take, eat3, This is My Body4, Which is given for you5; Do This in remembrance of Mes;

1 He reminds them of the approach of the Festival of the Passover (Matt. xxvi. 2); (ii) He sends two of the Apostles to make ready (Mk xiv. 13); (iii) He describes the guide who would direct them as ἄνθρωπος κεράμιον ύδατος βαστάζων (Mk xiv. 13; Luke xxii. 10); (iv) He prescribes the words they were to address to the owner of the house whither he would lead them (Matt. xxvi. 18; Mk xiv. 14; Lk. xxii. 11); (v) He even particularizes the size and aspect of the room which he would show them, ανώγεον μέγα έστρωμένον (Mk xiv. 15: Lk. xxii. 12).

3 Λάβετε, φάγετε, Matt. xxvi. 26. These words are peculiar to S. Matthew. See R.V.

4 Τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ σῶμά μου (Matt., Mk, Luke, 1 Cor. xi. 24).

<sup>5</sup> Τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν διδόμενον (Luke xxii. 19); κλώμενον (1 Cor. xi. 24), but κλώμενον is omitted by L. T. Tr. WH. R.V. Διδόμενον means which is being, or, is on the point of being, given for you.

6 Τοῦτο ποιείτε els την έμην άναμνησιν, Luke xxii. 19, 1 Cor. xi. 24. Ανάμνησις in Classical Greek means "a calling to mind," "an act of recollection"; but in the LXX. it has the fuller sense of a "commemoration." Thus in Levit. xxiv. 7 we read of the shewbread και έσονται είς άρτους είς ανάμνησιν προκείμενα τῷ κυρίῳ; again, in Num. x. 10, it is said of trumpets blown over the sacrifices, και ἔσται ύμεν ἀνάμνησις ἔναντι τοῦ θεοῦ ύμων. In the N. T. the word only occurs in one other place Heb. x. 3, άλλ' έν αὐταίς (χ. Ι ταίς αύταίς θυσίαις) ἀνάμνησις άμαρτιῶν κατ' ἐνιαυτόν. Here there is

(δ) Afterwards He took a cup of wine, probably the third cup, or "Cup of Blessing," and when He had given thanks, He gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of This; for This Cup is My Blood of the [New] Covenant2, Which is shed for many for the remission of sins3; Do This, as oft as ve shall drink it, in remembrance of Me4.

Thus calmly and deliberately, with His eyes fixed on His approaching death upon the Cross on the morrow, at one of the greatest historical Festivals of the Jews, our Lord instituted the Holy Sacrament of His Body and Blood. "What He was in no position to testify to the world on the following day, when the soldiers laid their rude hands upon Him, and bound Him—that His death was really an offering, a freewill surrender of Himself-that He testified now; 'What I give you to eat is My Body which is broken for you, what ye drink is My Blood which I shed for you 5."" a contrast between the sacrificial commemoration of sins under the Law, and the Eucharistic commemoration of the Redemption wrought out for us by our Lord. The Vulgate has "hoc facite in meam commemorationem"; the Rhenish Version follows it, "Do this for a commemoration of Me." Ποιείν is a usual LXX. sacrificial term.

1 Πίετε έξ αὐτοῦ πάντες, Matt. xxvi. 27. These words again are peculiar to S. Matthew.

xxii. 20).

3 Τὸ περὶ πολλῶν ἐκχυνόμενον εἰς άφεσιν άμαρτιων, Matt. xxvi. 28. S. Luke xxii. 20 has τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐκχυνόμενον; S. Mark xiv. 24 has ὑπέρ πολλων; This is My Blood of the [New] Covenant, which is being, or, is on the point of being, poured out for you, for many, unto remission of sins.

4 Τοῦτο ποιείτε, ὁσάκις ἂν πίνητε, εls την έμην ἀνάμνησιν, 1 Cor. xi. 25. This occurs only in S. Paul's narrative. Tyndale and Cranmer render the words, "This do as often as ye drink it, in the remembrance of Me." Thus, at this historic Festival, He enshrines in a unique and significant Rite the mysterious destruction of the temple of His Body, of which He had before darkly spoken, and not only recalls to the minds of His Apostles all that He had said respecting His Body as "true flesh," and His Blood as "true drink," but He actually supas "true drink," but He actually supplies the mode of that mysterious eating and drinking, which He had before so marwellously demanded as essential to true life. vi. The Eucharist no mere Sign. If, then, we deem the Institutor of this unique and unexampled Rite to have been all that He is declared to be in the Second Article, "the very and eternal God1," and as He is described in the Fifteenth Article, "the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world2"; if we reflect on the solemn and unparalleled circumstances under which He ordained it, and the elaborate preparation He made for its Institution<sup>3</sup> as the culminating point of all previous announcements, whether figurative or specific, respecting His coming Passion, it is impossible to regard the Rite as "only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another." The solemn words and actions, which accompanied the Institution, testify of themselves to the surpassing dignity of this Holy Mystery, and to His death as the source of an inestimable benefit to all mankind.

vii. The Eucharist a Sacrament of our Redemption. Having declared what the Holy Eucharist is not, the Article proceeds to affirm what it is. It states that it is "a Sacrament of our Redemption by Christ's death." The Passover, as often as it was celebrated by the Jews, recalled, as in a living drama4, the great story of the deliverance of the nation from cruel and oppressive bondage in Egypt (Deut. xvi. 2, 3)5; a deliverance, which elevated them from the condition of slaves to that of a ransomed people, and gave them the hope of entrance into the Promised Land of Canaan. So the Eucharist is the continued setting forth of the death of Christ as the means of the deliverance, not of a single nation, but of the whole world from the bondage of sin and Satan. In the Feast of the Passover the first place had been occupied by the lamb. It had been selected with scrupulous care (Exod. xii. 5). It had been slain with solemn ceremony. Its blood had been sprinkled on the brazen altar in the outer court of the Temple, and on the side posts and upper part of the door, and it had then been roast with fire and eaten by the Paschal company with thankful commemoration of redemption from degrading bondage in Egypt. But now that "the very Paschal Lamb" was come<sup>1</sup>, and was about to offer Himself on the Altar of His Cross, no word is said of the Jewish Paschal victim. The Bread and Wine, hitherto subordinate, now take the first place. The lamb had been eaten as a type of Him. He now ordains the Elements of Bread and Wine to be taken and received in remembrance of Him, who,

viii. The Inward Grace of the Sacrament. So much for the import of the Eucharist, as revealed by its actual institution. Respecting "the inward part, or thing signified"," the Article states that "to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith" receive the Elements ordained by Christ, "the Bread which we break is a partaking of the Body of Christ; and likewise the Cup of Blessing is a partaking of the Blood of Christ." The truth of this state-of the presence of the inward part or "Res Significata," for it was ordained by Christ Himself as a means whereby we receive, and a pleage to assure us that we do truly receive, His Body and Blood. See the Church Catechism, in which the objective Res Sacramenti is clearly distinguished from the subjective Virtus Sacramenti. Comp. also the Prayer of Humble Access; "Grant us so to eat the flesh of Thy dear Son."

¹ As on the tenth day of Nisan the Paschal Lamb was selected to be kept till the fourteenth day, so our Lord had "taken care that His entry into Jerusalem should fall on the very day when, according to the ordinance of Moses, the Paschal Lamb was chosen." See Döllinger, First Age of the Church, i. p. 51. E.T. 1866.
² In the Holy Eucharist the out-ment is sufficiently confirmed by the words of our Lord Himself. For while, on the occasion of the first Passover of His Public Ministry. He had declared to Nicodemus that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up (John ii. 14)1, and on the occasion of another Passover He had declared to the Jews in the synagogue of Capernaum that His Flesh was true meat, and His Blood true drink2 (John vi. 55), at this last Passover He gathered up in action all that He had then expressed in words. For, when He gave the Bread to His Apostles, He said, Take eat; this is My Body, and when He gave them the Cup, He said, This is My Blood of the Covenant. Thus as the Jewish Passover was a feast of Redemption, so He made this transfigured Passover to be for His Church the Sacrificial Feast of an infinitely greater Redemption not of a single nation, but of the whole world?

ix. Feasts on Sacrifices were common alike to the Jews and to the Gentile nations. They were means of ratifying covenants between God and man. They were especially characteristic of the peace-offerings of the Jews, and indicated that what had separated the sacrificer from

1 At the same Passover He had uttered in the hearing of the deputation from the Sanhedrin, Λύσατε τὸν ναδν τοθτον, και έν τρισιν ἡμέραις έγερῶ αὐτόν, John ii. 19. The sign is one of the most remarkable. As a Rabbi He answers the Rabbis. The words indicate a destruction, which comes from dissolution, from the breaking of that which binds the parts into a whole, or one thing to another. They "spring from an immeasurable depth. They illustrate domains then completely unexplored by any other consciousness than His own." Godet in loc.

2' Η γὰρ σάρξ μου ἀληθής ἐστι βρώσις, καὶ τὸ αῖμά μου ἀληθής ἐστι πόσις, John vi. 55. The words employed are such as it is inconceivable that any mere man could have uttered. On the lips of any merely human teacher they have no meaning whatever. Nowhere in any literature, not even in the luxuriant imagery of the East, do we find an instance of a teacher speaking of the reception of his doctrine under so astounding a metaphor as "eating his flesh" and "drinking his blood."

3 "The communion of the Paschal lamb, as the characteristic offering of the Old Law, had formed the foundation and centre of the whole sacrificial system of the Old Testament." Döllinger, First Age of the Church, i. p. 58. E.T. 1877.

Jehovah was now covered and cancelled, that the Most High now welcomed him to His table, and in this feast gave him a pledge of reconciliation and restoration to His favour<sup>1</sup>. So at this sacrificial feast of the New Covenant, our Lord assures us that He has become our peace (Eph. ii. 14; Col. i. 20), and invites us to receive "the spiritual food" of His own precious Body and Blood. At this Holy Table we are His guests, and receive Him under the earthly veils of Bread and Wine. The old Passover was a Feast upon a Sacrifice, the Holy Eucharist is a Feast upon a Sacrifice. "The one on the lamb; the other on the Lamb of God. The one true; the other true. The one carnally true; the other spiritually, and, therefore, even more true2." And thus in this holy Feast "we are one with Christ, and Christ with us," and "the Bread, which we break is a partaking of the Body of Christ; and likewise the Cup of Blessing is a partaking of the Blood of Christ."

x. Transubstantiation. The exact definition of the way in which the outward Elements (Sacramentum) in this Sacred Feast become the Body and Blood of Christ (Res Sacramenti), has occasioned great controversy. The early Church<sup>3</sup> did not attempt to explain the Mystery. The doctrine of the manner of Christ's Presence in the Holy

The change in the elements through consecration was in the oldest times expressed by the simplest terms, "It is," "It becomes"; or in prayer to God, "consecrate," "perfect," "appoint," "make." The Liturgy of S. Chrysostom, and others following it, use the words, "change by Thy Spirit." There are also other more emphatic yet rare words, occurring once or twice only in each Father who uses them, "transmute, "transelement," "transfashion," "transfigure." Μεταποιεῖσθαι is once used by S. Gregory of Nyssa, and once by Theodoret, μεταρρυθμίζειν and μετασκευάζειν, each by S. Chrysostom; "transfiguro," twice by S. Ambrose; "transfero," in the Gallican Sacramentary.

Eucharist, and the precise nature of the relation in which the consecrated Elements and the Body and Blood of Christ stand to one another, never came into serious debate, and thus never were the subject of authoritative definition. Men were content with the blessing, and did not care to define it. That Christ was present in the Sacrament, that in that Sacred Feast He fed the faithful with the precious food of His own most blessed Body and Blood, in this all the Fathers of the Early Church were agreed<sup>1</sup>. As yet however, there was but little speculation as to what was the manner of this Presence.

xi. Paschasius Radbert. But matters could not always continue in this state, and in the ninth century Paschasius Radbert, a learned monk<sup>2</sup>, afterwards Abbot of New Corbey, well skilled in all the theological learning of his age, put forth a treatise On the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. In this he maintained that by virtue of the priestly consecration and the co-operation of the Holy Ghost, the material elements were so transformed as to retain no more than an appearance ("figura") of their natural substance, being truly, though invisibly, replaced by Christ Himself in every way the same as He was born and crucified3. This view was opposed by another monk of Corbey, Ratramnus4, who put forth a counter treatise at the request of the Emperor Charles the Bald. He favoured a real, while he disbelieved in a corporal, or material presence in the Eucharist. The controversy slumbered during the whole of the tenth century, but was revived by Berengarius, Archdeacon of Angers, A.D.

1040, who re-asserted the view expounded by Ratramnus. This exposed him to much opposition, and he was twice compelled to sign a formula of faith, in which terms were used suggestive of the annihilation of the Elements of Bread and Wine1. The view, to which he subscribed, that Christ's Body is present in the Eucharist sensualiter, that it is broken by the priest, and this not sacramentally only, but naturally and substantially2, was the doctrine widely held by the ignorant among both clergy and laity at the era of the Reformation3.

xii. The Scholastic Doctrine. The current philosophy during the Scholastic period was Aristotelian. It was the laudable desire of the Schoolmen to show the consistency of its principles with the Catholic Faith4. In the terms of this philosophy it was taught that every object we can take cognizance of by the senses possesses two invariable properties (i) the "accidents" or external stance, but what is expressed by the Greek ovoia, essence. Hence the Greek word μετουσίωσις corresponding to transubstantiation. The word is first found in an exposition of the Canon of the Mass by Peter Damian, A.D. 988—1027, cap. vii. It first appears as a term accepted and recognized by the Roman Church at the fourth Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215.

Accident, from accidere to fall, to happen, denotes (1) anything that happens, any occurrence, or incident; (ii) that which is present by chance, and therefore non-essential; a property or a quality not essential to our conception of a substance; an attribute: (iii) in Scholastic Theology the ma-properties, as shape, form, colour, size, material, and (ii) the "substance," the internal, invisible essence, the true reality, in which the "accidents," as being external, inhere. The particular philosophical explanation offered was that, after consecration, while the accidents remained the same as before, the invisible substances or essences of the bread and wine respectively were transubstantiated into the substances or essences of the Body and Blood of Christ¹. Thus transubstantiation was defined at the Council of Trent, and this is the definition of the Roman Church held now.

xiii. The First Objection which the Article makes to this refinement on the teaching of Paschasius is that it "cannot be proved by holy Writ; but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture." When He instituted the Sacrament, our Lord did not say "This represents My Body," or "This has the power and efficacy of My Body," but "This is My Body." Thus He indicates a deep mystery, whereby what was bread is called and is His Body, and what was the cup is called and is His Body, and what was the word "Bread" and the word "the Cup" to describe these Elements after consecration. He says to the Corinthians, As often as ye eat this Bread and drink the Cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till He come (I Cor. xi. 26). The bread is still called "the Bread."

terial qualities remaining in the Sacramental Bread and Wine after consecration. Comp. Wyclif, A.D. 1380, Eng. Wks., "No man durste seye til nou bat accident is Goddis body, for bis newe worde may haue no ground"; Caxton, Golden Leg., "Whan the breed is converted into the precious body of our Lord the accidents abyden"; Lydgate, Pylg. Sowle, A.D. 1483, "Quantitie is an accident only appro-

The cup is still called "the Cup." Transubstantiation is not in the same category with the Apostle's words.

xiv. The Second Objection taken in the Article is that the doctrine "overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament." A Sacrament, as we have seen, consists of two parts, the outward visible sign and the inward spiritual grace. There must exist in any true Sacrament the "signum," the sign, and the "res significata," or thing signified. Now if after consecration the outward and visible sign ceases, as is held, to have any substantial existence, the thing signified alone remains, and the nature of a Sacrament is overthrown. The visible sign of that which is invisible is left only in its accidents.

xv. The Third Objection is that it has "given rise to many superstitions." In any case, the mental conditions of the Middle Ages naturally favoured crude notions of the Divine Presence in the Eucharist. Such, for instance, were the stories of the appearances of our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament as a little child<sup>2</sup>; of drops of blood flowing, when Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, broke the Host; and other traditions alluded to by Ælfric in his Homilies<sup>3</sup>. It is easy to see that the formulation and propagation of a doctrine like that of Transubstantiation, a philosophical explanation, intelligible only to the trained mind, and easily mistaken by the popular imagination, were calculated to give an academic sanction to such notions as these

Evertere = (i) to turn out, to drive out; (ii) to overthrow, as "silvis evertere pinum," Virg. Georg. i. 256; (iii) to overthrow, completely destroy, as "evertere funditus amicitiam," Cic. Fin. ii. 25; "evertere...disciplinam militarem," Livy viii. 30. The English translation "overthroweth" is

xvi. The View advanced in the Article. In primitive times, as we have said, we trace no such subtle speculations as these, we find no exact statement as to the nature and extent of the change effected by consecration in the Holy Eucharist. Men were content to maintain a reverent reserve in respect to so great a mystery. They believed that in the words of S. Justin Martyr, the Eucharist is no longer "common bread or common drink"; that in this sacred Feast Christ feeds us with the precious food of His Body and Blood, but they did not attempt to define the mode or the manner of His Presence<sup>1</sup>. Similarly cautious and guarded is the language of the Article. It states that the Body of Christ is "given, taken, and eaten in the Supper," and herein it agrees with the language of the Catechism<sup>2</sup>. But repudiating the idea of a material presence of Christ's Flesh and Blood, it affirms that He is given and received "only after an heavenly and spiritual manner." Christ's Body is now a glorified Body<sup>3</sup>, and no longer subject to the conditions of its earthly state. Flesh and blood, writes S. Paul, cannot inherit the kingdom of God (I Cor. xv. 50). Any Presence of Christ, therefore. in the Blessed Sacrament, must have reference to His glorified, heavenly, Body. But His Presence is not less

1 "All things considered, and compared with that success which truth hath hitherto had by so bitter conflicts with errors in this point, shall I wish that men would more give themselves to meditate with silence what we have by the Sacrament, and less to dispute of the manner how?" Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. Ixvii. 3.

<sup>2</sup> Compare the words of the Church Catechism, "What is the inward part or thing signified? The Body and Blood of Christ, which are verily and indeed (vere et reipsa)," i.e., truly and actually, not in a mere metaphorical sense, not only in a figure, "taken and received (sumuntur et percipiuntur) by the faithful in the Lord's Supper." The use of the word "taken" implies that what is received has its existence apart from the recipient.

3 "His human substance in itself is naturally absent from the earth, His soul and body not on earth but in heaven only....Yet as the manhood of Christ may after a sort be everywhere said to be present, because that Person is everywhere present, from whose divine substance manhood nowhere is severed; so the same universality of presence may likewise seem in another respect appliable thereunto, namely, by cooperation with Deity, and that in all things." Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v.lv. 7, 8.

but more real¹ because it is spiritual and ineffable, and passes all human comprehension². The Article does not, to use the words of Bishop Guest³, "exclude the Presence of Christ's Body from the Sacrament, but only the grossness and sensibleness in the receiving thereof." It simply refuses to define what passes all definition, and what it finds a mystery it leaves a mystery under the shadow of God's throne⁴.

"Whereat I waked, and found Before mine eyes all real, as the

Had lively shadowed":

it denotes (ii) true, genuine, not artificial or counterfeit, as a real fact; (iii) as a law-term, real estate, real property, e.g. lands, tenements as opposed to personal or moveable property. A real presence denotes the presence of a reality, a true, actual presence as opposed to an untrue, counterfeit, unreal presence.

<sup>2</sup> That the compilers of the Articles did not reject the Scholastic theory of Transubstantiation because they shrank from a full belief in the Sacramental Presence is clear from many statements of the leading divines of the sixteenth century. Thus Bishop Ridley writes, "The true Church of Christ doth acknowledge a Presence of Christ's Body in the Lord's Supper, but yet sacramentally and spiritually, not carnally or corporally giving life, and in that respect really, that is, according to His benediction, giving life." Ridley's Works, P. Society, p. 236; again he writes "That heavenly Lamb is (as I confess) on the Table; but by a spiritual presence, and not after any corporal presence," Works, p. 249; "Thus much we must be sure to hold," we read in the Second Book of the Homilies, "that in the Supper of the Lord there is no vain ceremony, no bare sign, no untrue figure of a thing absent"; First Pt. of the Sermon concerning the Sacrament, p. 378, ed. 1802. Again Bishop Jewel, the chief writer of the Second Book of Homilies, says, "Diserteque pronunciamus, in Cœna credentibus vere exhiberi Corpus et Sanguinem Domini, carnem Filii Dei," Jewel, Apologia, Pt. II. xi. i.

<sup>3</sup> Bishop Guest, who was chiefly concerned in penning this Article, writes, "I told the Bishop of Gloucester plainly that the word only in the aforesaid Article did not exclude the Presence of Christ's Body from the Sacrament, but only the grossness and sensibleness in the receiving thereof." Guest's Letter to Cecil, Dec. 22, 1566. So also Bishop Andrewes writes, " As to the Real Presence we are agreed; our controversy is as to the mode of it. The Presence we believe to be real as you do. As to the mode we define nothing rashly, nor anxiously investigate, any more than in Baptism we enquire how Christ's Blood washes us; any more than in the Incarnation of Christ we ask how the human is united to the divine nature in One Person." Bp. Andrewes, Responsio, p. 13; comp. his Sermon on the Resurrection, ii. p. 302.

xvii. The Last Clause of the Article deals with various points connected with the celebration of the Eucharist, such as reservation, carrying about, elevation, and adoration of the Elements. These ceremonies it affirms are no parts of Christ's original institution. They may be omitted without breaking our Lord's enactment respecting the celebration of the Sacrament. He did not ordain it in order that they should be observed; they are not essential to the validity of the Sacrament; an exaggerated sense of their importance is a danger to be avoided.

xviii. Reservation was allowed in primitive times for the sake of carrying a portion of the consecrated Elements to the sick. Thus Justin Martyr in his First Apology, describing the celebration of the Eucharist says, "The Deacons communicate each of those present, and carry away to the absent of the blest Bread and Wine and Water1." Again Eusebius, near the beginning of the fourth century, tells of a man, who on his death bed sent at night for a priest to communicate him, and, the priest being ill, the Eucharist, which must have been reserved, was taken to him by a layman2. S. Chrysostom relates how in a tumult at Constantinople soldiers entered the place, where the holy vessels were stored, and the most Holy Blood of Christ was spilt on their garments. The practice was subsequently still further developed, and resorted to in the case of long journeys by land and by sea4. The custom, ment by, e.g. Theodoret, S. Gelasius, and S. Chrysostom, as an illustra-tion of the Catholic doctrine of the Two Natures of our Lord; if annihilation of the bread and wine had been the doctrine of their day it would have supported not the Catholic, but 1 S. Just. Mart. Apol. i. 65.

however of reservation, is one of permission not of obligation, its observance forms no part of the original institution of the Sacrament, and each independent Church, as possessed of power "to decree rites or ceremonies," may adopt or disallow the practice as it may be judged to be expedient.

xix. The Carrying about of the Blessed Sacrament in solemn processions was a ceremony introduced into the Church during the Middle Ages. It does not exist in the orthodox Eastern Church, neither do any of the Eastern heretical Churches practise it. It is difficult to fix the date of its first<sup>1</sup> introduction. The Feast of Corpus Christi was instituted by Pope Urban IV. in 1264, and subsequently commanded by Clement V. in 1311, but it formed no part of the original institution or of Apostolic practice.

xx. Elevation. S. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians speaks of Christ as being "placarded" or "visibly held up" as crucified before the eyes of the Galatians<sup>2</sup> (Gal. iii. 1). In some such sense as this, it is said, is the Blessed Sacrament elevated in the Canon of the Mass or at the modern Office of Benediction. But the custom is not ancient. There is no allusion to it in the early Sacramentaries<sup>3</sup> of Gelasius, Leo, or Gregory, or in the ancient writers<sup>4</sup> on the ceremonies of the Church. It is not till Fr. Dominic, who was to make the fiery trial, held the Sacrament in his hand." See Bp. Forbes, Articles, p. 570.

προεγράφη ἐσταυρωμένος. Gal. iii. r. <sup>8</sup> In all early Oriental Liturgies an elevation of the Host by the celebrating Priest is prescribed contemporaneously with the proclamation äγια ἀγίοις, and before the Fraction. Thus in the Liturgy of S. James, "then he elevates the gifts and saith 'Holy things to holy persons'"; in the Liturgy of S. Chrysostom, "the priest, elevating the holy bread exclaims, 'Holy things for holy persons." But the rite took place within the Bema, while the doors were closed and the curtains drawn. The original intention, therefore, was clearly not that the Host might be adored by the people. Smith's Dict. Christian Antiqq. i. 605.

xxi. Adoration. In reference to this point the Article is worded very carefully and with great moderation. As it is stated in Art. xxv. that the object for which Christ ordained the Sacraments was not that they might be "gazed upon" or "carried about," so here it is laid down that the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist "was not by Christ's ordinance...worshipped." The Article deals with contemporary abuse. Men had come to regard the Sacrament of the Altar as fulfilling a function in the Church quite independent of the Mass. The proper relation was inverted. It was as if the Liturgy were celebrated and the Sacrament were reserved in order to bring God down to earth and to keep Him here, and not in order to raise man to Heaven and to give him tellowship with God. This the Article repudiates, and not the worship due to our Lord present in the Sacrament under the forms of Bread and Wine1.

of the practice in the ancient Sacramentaries, or the codices of the Ordo Romanus, or in any of the writers on ritual, Alcuin, Amalarius, Walafrid. There is little doubt that the custom of Elevation owes its introduction to the spread of the tenets of Berengarius in A.D. 1050, against which it was regarded as a public protest. It had little or no authoritative sanction before the 13th century. See Smith's Dict. Christian Antigg. i. 606; Bingham, Oric. Eccl. xxxxx.

Prayer-Book. The wording of it was altered at the Caroline Settlement. On its first appearance it ran thus: "We do declare (i.e. by kneeling) no adoration is intended...unto any real and essential presence there being of Christ's Natural Flesh and Blood." On its re-introduction at the Caroline settlement it was worded, "unto any Corporal Presence of Christ's natural Flesh and Blood." Thus the words "Corporal Presence" take the place of "real and essential Presence." Procter, Book of Common Prayer, pp. 122, 139. ### ARTICLE XXIX.

De Manducatione Corporis Christi et impios illud non manducare.

Impii, et fide viva destituti, licet carnaliter et visibiliter (ut Augustinus loquitur) corporis et sanguinis Christi Sacramentum, dentibus premant, nullo tamen modo Christi participes efficiuntur. Sed potius tantæ rei Sacramentum, seu symbolum, ad judicium sibi manducant, et bibunt<sup>1</sup>.

Of the wicked which do not eate the body of Christe in the vse of the Lordes Supper.

The wicked, and suche as be voyde of a liuelye fayth, although they do carnally and visibly presse with their teeth (as Saint Augustine sayth) the Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ: yet in no wyse are the[y] partakers of Christe, but rather to their condemnation do eate and drinke the signe or Sacrament of so great a thing.

- i. Connection. After stating in the preceding Article "that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith, receive the same, the Bread which we break is a partaking of the Body of Christ; and likewise the Cup of Blessing is a partaking of the Blood of Christ," the xxixth Article proceeds to speak of "the Wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith," who yet draw near to this Holy Feast. At a time when it was the great aim of those, who drew up the Articles, to emphasize the idea of Communion, it was natural to fear that people, "who would not part with their sins, would thrust themselves into holy things to their own hurt."
- ii. History. The xxixth Article was altogether wanting in 1553, and did not appear in the early printed copies of the draft of 1563. It owes its origin to Archbishop Parker, and we may conclude that it was probably composed in 1563¹, but was not absolutely and fully adopted till 1571. In drawing it up, the Archbishop took his statements almost word for word from a passage in S. Augustine's Commentary on the sixth Chapter of S. John's Gospel². But the Benedictine editors³ of that great Father's works deemed portions of the passage to be interpolated, and the fairness of the quotation was called in question by Cecil⁴, Elizabeth's minister, at an interview between him and Parker, and the passage was verified by reference to the treatise, out of which it was taken.

iii. The Title. Though the Title forms no part of the Article yet it deserves attention. It is, then, to be observed that it does not say that the wicked "receive not," but that they "eat not" the Body of Christ "in the use of the Lord's Supper." Now the expression "eat not the Body of Christ" is taken from the sixth Chapter of S. John's Gospel, and imports that the wicked eat not in such a way, that they "thereby dwell in Christ and Christ in them," they neither eat nor drink of the Bread and Wine

The passage, as it runs in S. Augustine, is as follows: "Ac per hoc qui non manet in Christo, et in quo non manet Christus, procul dubio nec manducat (spiritaliter) Carnem Ejus, nec bibit Ejus Sanguinem (licet carnaliter et visibiliter premat dentibus Sacramentum Corporis et Sanguinis Christi), sed magis tantæ rei Sacramentum ad judicium sibi manducat et bibit." The parts deemed interpolations by the Benedictine edition are enclosed in brackets, and are put in italics. The clauses are found in the Commentaries of Bede and Alcuin on S. John. See App. ii., p. 437.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Cecil's gentleness in dealing with the adherents of the Old Learning, whether Romish or Lutheran, is well known. For the letter to Cecil by Bishop Guest, May 1571, which may have occasioned this interview between the Minister and the Archbishop, see Bishop Guest, Articles xxviii., xxix., by the Rev. G. F. Hodges, p. 24, quoted from the State Papers, Domestic, Elizabeth, 1571, Vol. lxxv., No. 36.

for any purpose or effect unto which Christ ordained these Elements to be received.

- iv. Analysis. This consideration of the Title prepares us for the Article itself, which states that
  - (α) "The Wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ;
  - (β) But rather, to their condemnation, do eat and drink the sign or Sacrament of so great a thing."
- v. The Phraseology here used is very important. It is not said that the wicked are not partakers of the Body and Blood of Christ; it is said that "in no wise are they partakers of Christ." The expression "partakers of Christ" occurs in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where the writer says, We are become partakers of Christ<sup>2</sup>, if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end (Heb. iii. 14), and in another place he speaks of those who were once the case, by the simple fact of being eaten and drunk, beneficial; and no such thing is contemplated as a real eating of them, which is not a beneficial eating of them also." Professor Mozley, Lectures and Theol. Papers, p. 205.

<sup>2</sup> Μέτοχοι γὰρ τοῦ Χριστοῦ γεγόναμεν. Participes Christi effecti sumus. Vulg. "We have been united with Him and so we have been made now to partake in the fulness of His life." S. Chrysostom paraphrases it, Μετέχομεν αὐτοῦ, φησίν, ἐν ἐγενόμεθα ἡμεῶς καὶ αὐτός, εἔπερ, αὐτὸς μὲν κεφαλὴ σῶμα δὲ ἡμεῶς, συγκληρονόμοι καὶ σύσσωμοι. "In eo etiam participamur, quia Corpus et Sanguinem Ejus sumimus ad redemptionem nostram." Primasius, quoted by Bp. Westcott in loc.

<sup>1</sup> In S. John vi. 50, our Lord says, This is the Bread, which cometh down out of heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die; in vi. 51, He says, If a man eat of this Bread, he shall live for ever; and in vi. 54, He that eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood hath eternal life. R.V. "To eat, therefore, the Body of Christ is used of such eating, whereby a man dwelleth in Christ and Christ in Him; whereby he shall 'live for ever,' whereby he hath eternal life, and liveth by Christ, as Christ liveth by the Father." Pusey, Real Presence, p. 255. "Nowhere in Scripture do we hear of an eating and drinking of the true Body and Blood of our Lord which is not profitable. The Body and Blood are of that nature, that they are in the reason of enlightened and tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost1 (Heb. vi. 4). To be a partaker of the Holy Ghost is to have a share of Him, Who is the gift of God, shed abroad in the hearts of all those, who are His by the Spirit; it is to be a partaker of Christ Himself. Now the impious and wilfully impenitent, so long as they remain such, are the enemies of the Cross of Christ, they belong to those who are said to crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame (Heb. vi. 6). Clearly, so long as they remain impenitent and void of a living faith, they are not and cannot be "partakers of Christ." And there was much reason in the times of Archbishop Parker to warn those, who would thrust themselves into holy things, that to approach the Lord's Table in a spirit of unbelief, contempt and disobedience, was to expose themselves to grievous risk; that they might "carnally and visibly press with their teeth the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ?," but could not be "partakers of Christ." They might receive the "Sacramentum," and the "Res Sacramenti"; they could not receive the "Virtus Sacramentis."

1 Μετόχους γενηθέντας Πνεύματος aylov. "The compound expression (μετόχους γενηθέντας), as distinguished from μετασχόντας (Heb. ii. 14), marks more than the simple fact of participation (Heb. vii. 13; 1 Cor. x. 17). It brings out the fact of a personal character gained; and that gained in a vital development." Bp. Westcott

2 "The spiritual food of our Lord's eaten Body and Blood, cannot be eaten except spiritually...But if it cannot be eaten except spiritually, how does the carnal man supply the spiritual medium and instrumentality of eating? The carnal man has only the natural mouth and teeth to apply; this is all he has; but this is totally irrelevant to spiritual food." Professor Mozley, Lectures and Theol. Papers, p. 205.

3 It is the Virtus Sacramenti which the unworthy and impenitent do not receive. "Aliud est Sacramentum, aliud Virtus Sacramenti. Quam multi de altari accipiunt et moriuntur, et accipiendo moriuntur." S Aug. Tract. in Joann. xxvi. 11. In theological language the word Sacramentum has two senses: it may mean (i) the "outward and visible sign," the bare signum, (ii) the signum together with the res significata, not the Virtus Sacramenti the "whole-some effect or operation." It is in the second and more comprehensive sense that the word is here used by S. Augustine.

vi. The Words of S. Paul, when he found it necessary to correct the disorders that had crept into the Church at Corinth as regards the celebration of the Lord's Supper, support the language of the Article. The Apostle writes, Whosoever shall eat the Bread or drink the Cup of the Lord unworthily2, shall be guilty of the Body and Blood of the Lord.....he that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgement unto himself, if 8 he discern not the Body4 (I Cor. xi. 27, 29). It is plain from this that the Apostle draws a distinction between a worthy and an unworthy mode of approaching the Blessed Sacrament, between a reverent recognition of the presence of the Lord in this holy Feast, and a profane and irreverent attitude, which fails by its "unhallowed sense" to discern the inward part of the Sacrament. The just inference from the Apostle's words is that there can be no beneficial reception6 of the Sacrament by those who persist in living in a state of wilful sin, for to them Christ is present not to bless, but to judge.

 $^1$  "H  $\pi l \nu \eta$  "or drink," not "and drink," a translation not only erroneous but detrimental to the significance, of the warning. "Unworthy and irreverent partaking, whether of the one element or the other, involved the guilt of which the Apostle is about to speak,-guilt in regard of the whole blessed Sacrament; hence του σώματος και τοῦ αίματος in the clause that follows." Bp. Ellicott in loc.

4 "Note these words, 'The Lord's Body.' It is not here said, 'The sign or Sacrament of the Lord's Body, nor the grace or fruit of the Lord's Body, nor the memory of the Lord's Passion, but plainly, 'The Lord's Body,' to teach us that the evil men of the Church do receive Christ's Body." Bishop Guest's Letter to Cecil, State Papers, Elizabeth, 1571. "Corpus enim Domini et sanguis Domini nihilominus erat etiam illis quibus dicebat Apostolus, Qui manducat indigne, judicium sibi manducat et bibit." S. Aug. De Baptismo contra Donat. v. 9.

6 "The thing offered to them is identical with that which is offered to the faithful, but they lack both the will and the power to assimilate it. Honest faith, however rudimentary, and right intention, however weak in practice, may count on receiving the Body of Christ; but the touch of positive unbelief and contempt and disobedience profanes the Sacrament." ### ARTICLE XXX.

De Vtraque Specie.

Of both kindes.

Calix Domini Laicis non est denegandus: utraque enim pars Dominici Sacramenti ex Christi institutione et præcepto, omnibus Christianis ex æquo administrari debet. The cuppe of the Lorde is not to be denyed to the laye people. For both the partes of the Lordes Sacrament, by Christes ordinance and commaundement, ought to be ministred to all Christian men alike.

- i. The Thirtieth Article, like the preceding one, was wanting in the series of 1553, but was introduced by Archbishop Parker in the reign of Elizabeth, at the revision in 1563<sup>1</sup>.
- ii. Object. Its object is to vindicate for the laity a right to Communion in Both Kinds, to the Cup as well as to the Bread. The custom which had arisen in the Western Church of administering to the lay-folk the Sacred Body only, while the Priest alone<sup>2</sup> partook of the Chalice, had given rise to much controversy long before the Reformation. It was indeed the cause of terrible wars, especially in Bohemia, where the people rose in a body and protested desperately against being deprived of a part of the Sacrament, which Christ had intended for all alike.

iii. Analysis. The Article plainly resolves itself into:—

(i) A statement;

"The Cup¹ of the Lord is not to be denied to the Lay-people:" and

(ii) A justification of the statement;

"For both the parts of the Lord's Sacrament," by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be ministered to all Christian men alike."

iv. The Original Institution. That the Chalice was intended for the laity may be proved, (i) from the original institution of the Sacrament as recorded in the New Testament, and (ii) from the writings of the early Fathers. In the account of the original institution we are told that the words of our Lord to His Apostles were

Drink ye all of this3;

and that they complied with His command is clear, for we read in the Gospel of S. Mark

And they all drank of it 4.

Here we might suppose the argument was at an end. It is urged, however, that the Apostles, forming a consecrated body of Priests, might receive the Chalice, and so the command does not apply to the laity. But upon this it is to be observed that even if we assume that the Apostles were at the time all Priests, the account of the original institution is not that our Lord received the Chalice and none else, but that He received and they received. Thus there is no justification for withholding the Cup not only from the laity, but even from all the Clergy, except the officiating Priest<sup>1</sup>.

- v. Apostolic Custom. If we ask whether, as a matter of fact, the Apostles administered to themselves and their successors in Both Kinds, and to the lay-members of the Church in One Kind only, an answer is ready to hand from the Scriptures of the New Testament. For
  - (α) Surely, it is impossible to understand how the troubles at Corinth could have originated at all, had the Chalice been denied to the laity. If they had no right to it at all, how came it to pass that excesses calling for such stern rebuke from S. Paul accompanied the administration? Why, again, in rebuking them does he not say that they had done wrong in receiving the Species of Wine at all? Would not such have been a simpler and more obvious way of checking these excesses? Again, what force would there have been in his argument about the heathen sacrificial feasts, Ye cannot drink the Cup of the Lord and the Cup of demons³, except the laity were permitted to drink of the Chalice?
  - (β) Moreover, the Paschal associations of the Eucharist, so fresh in those early days, afford, in the absence of any direct evidence to the contrary, a strong presumption against the denial of the "Cup of Blessing" to any class of persons in the primitive Christian community.

I See Bp Browne On the Articles, p. 735. I Cor. xi. 17—34.

Judging, therefore, from the practice of a Gentile Church like that of Corinth, and from the origin of the Sacred Rite itself, it is probable that the Apostolic administration of the Eucharist contemplated the reception of the Species alike of the Bread and of the Wine by all the faithful.

- vi. Patristic Testimony. Thus Apostolic custom is opposed to reception in one kind only. What is the teaching of the Primitive Fathers? It is equally decisive. For
  - (a) We find Justin Martyr saying in his Apology that "the Deacons gave to everyone that was present of the bread, over which thanks had been offered, and of wine mixed with water, and that they carried them also to those not present1;"
  - Again, Cyprian speaks of the deacons as  $(\beta)$ "offering the Cup to those present" at the Holy Eucharist without any intimation of a distinction of persons in so doing2:
  - (y) Once more S. Chrysostom in his Commentary on the first Epistle to the Corinthians writes, "whereas under the Old Covenant the Priests ate some things and the laymen others, and it was not lawful for the people to partake of those things of which the Priest partook, it is not so now, but one Body is blessed before all, and one Cub3."

These quotations, without multiplying others, sufficiently justify, so far as early custom is concerned, a practice which obtained in the Church without question for upwards of twelve centuries, and which the Greek Church still maintains, for she always does and always has communicated her many millions of believers in Both Kinds

vii. The Origin of the practice of communicating in One Kind may be traced to the fear of spilling the Blessed Sacrament at the time of administration. This led to the dipping of the Bread into the Chalice, as was done in the early Church in communicating the sick, and as is still done in the Greek Church, or to the use of a fistula or tube, through which the Consecrated Wine might be drawn, Gradually, however, and especially in the Twelfth Century, the administration of the Chalice began to be forbidden by many Bishops to avoid the risk of irreverence, and of spilling the Sacred Species. The change, however, was not brought about without much opposition, not only from eminent divines, but even from Ecclesiastical Councils. Thus in A.D. 1095 the Council of Clermont decreed that "all, who communicated at the altar, shall receive the Body and Blood of Christ under Both Kinds, if there be no provision to the contrary2." Moreover it is acknowledged by Cardinal Bona, one of the most eminent liturgical writers of the Roman Communion, that "the faithful always and in all places, from the beginning of the Church till the twelfth century, were used to communicate under the Species of Bread and Wines." Nay, even the Council of Constance, which first decreed on June 15, 1415, the with-holding of the Cup from the laity<sup>1</sup>, allows that "Christ Himself administered in Both Kinds to His disciples, and that in the Primitive Church the Sacrament was received in Both Kinds by the people<sup>2</sup>." The responsibility for introducing so great a change must lie with those who chose to violate a custom<sup>3</sup>, which has on its side a prescription of twelve centuries, and which was never disputed in the primitive ages of the Church<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>3</sup> Even Pope Gelasius lays it down that people "should either partake of the Sacraments in their entirety or be excluded from the entire Sacraments, because the division of one and the same mystery cannot take place without great sacrilege." See Gratian, Corpus Jur. Can. Decr. iii. pars; De Consecr. dist. ii. c. 12, quoted by Bishop Forbes, 596; Pope Leo the Great pronounces abstinence from the Chalice to be a Manichæan heresy.

4 It is contended that, from a theological point of view, the validity of Communion in One Kind is justified by the doctrine of concomitance, according to which under either the smallest particle of the Bread or the least drop of the Chalice is veiled the One and Undivided Christ in His glorified Humanity. Allowing the truth of this doctrine, we may yet maintain the irregularity of such Communion. Nor can we forget that spiritual writers have regarded the joy of the Lord as a special gift of the Chalice. At times of pestilence, and under similar exceptional conditions. the practice of Communion in One Kind may, however, be found necessary.

ARTICLE XXXI.

Oblatio Christi semel facta, perfecta est redemptio, propitiatio, et satisfactio pro omnibus peccatis totius mundi, tam originalibus quam actualibus. Neque præter illam unicam est ulla alia pro peccatis expiatio. Vnde missarum sacrificia, quibus uulgo dicebatur, Sacerdotem offerre Christum in remissionem pænæ aut culpæ pro uiuis et defunctis, blasphema figmenta sunt, et pernitiosæ imposturæ.

Of the one oblation of Christe finished uppon the Crosse.

The offering of Christ once made, is the perfect redemption, propiciation, and satisfaction for all the sinnes of the whole worlde, both originall and actuall, and there is none other satisfaction for sinne, but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifices of Masses, in the which it was commonly said that the Priestes did offer Christe for the quicke and the dead, to haue remission of payne or gylt, were blasphemous fables, and daungerous deceits.

- i. Title and Connection. The Latin Title of the Article has been uniform since 1553. The English Title then ran, "Of the perfeicte oblacion of Christe made upon the crosse." It forms the conclusion of the Sacramental Articles, which have all been leading up to it, and it states what that is, independently of which the Sacraments have no value in themselves.
- ii. Origin. The Article is derived from the Third Article of the Second Part<sup>2</sup> of the Augsburg Series of 1530. That Article begins by stating emphatically that certain Lutheran Divines who met the Elector at Torgau early in 1530, in anticipation of the Augsburg Diet. See Hardwick, Hist. Art., p. 22.

the Holy Eucharist, or the Mass, had never been abolished by the Lutherans, but was celebrated by them with the greatest possible reverence, only with some changes of ceremonial, and with the addition of some German Hymns for the instruction of the people<sup>1</sup>.

- iii. Object. The design of the Article is twofold:-
  - (α) To urge with all possible emphasis and clearness the uniqueness and completeness of the Sacrifice, which our Blessed Lord offered upon His Cross²;
  - (β) To refute a prevalent superstition as to the repetition of that Sacrifice in "the sacrifices of Masses, in the which it was commonly said that the Priestes did offer Christe for the quicke and the dead, to have remission of payne or gylt*."
- iv. Analysis. This being its object, the Article may be thus analysed:—
  - (α) It declares that the offering of Christ once made<sup>4</sup> is "the perfect redemption, propitiation,

2 "If the Sacrifice of the Mass be the same with the Sacrifice of the Cross, we attribute more unto it than yourselves; we place our whole hope of salvation in it. If you understand another Propitiatory Sacrifice distinct from that as this of the Mass seems to be; if you think of any new meritorious Satisfaction to God for the sins of the world; you must give us leave to renounce your Sacrifice indeed, and to adhere to the Apostle," By one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified, Heb. x. 14; Archbp Bramhall, Works, vol. i. p. 54.

3 "What the Article speaks of here is not 'the sacrifice of the Mass,' but the habit of trusting to the purchase of Masses when dying, to the neglect of a holy life, or repentance, and the grace of God and His mercy in Christ Jesus, while in health." Pusey, Eirenicon, i. DD, 25, 26.

- and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual";
- ( $\beta$ ) It affirms that besides this One Sacrifice there is "none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone";
- (γ) It repudiates the idea that the priest repeated this one Sacrifice once made in "the sacrifices of Masses," so that they were, of themselves, propitiatory¹ for the quick and the dead.
- v. The First Clause of the Article is noticeable for the number of words used to set forth the completeness and all-sufficiency of our Lord's sacrifice of Himself "once made2" on the altar of His Cross. It is described as "the perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins3 of the whole world, both original and actual."
  - (1) The Perfect Redemption. The first of these three figures is borrowed from the redemption of a slave, and his deliverance from bondage. The idea of His Sacrifice being a ransom is one which our Lord Himself set forth. The Son of

1 "The Article was directed against the errors of those, who, by rejecting the doctrine of a sacrifice by way of commemoration and consecration, and not literally identical with that on the Cross, and by their crude and objectionable mode of expression countenanced the vulgar error, that the sacrifice of the Eucharist or Mass was in every respect equal to that of Christ on the Cross; and that it was in fact either a reiteration or a continuation of that Sacrifice." Palmer, Treatise on the Church, ii. p. 463.

oblatio et satisfactio, non solum pro culpa originis, sed etiam pro omnibus reliquis peccatis," and the language of Article II. (above pp. 58, 59), where it is said that Christ came "ut esset hostia, non tantum pro culpa originis, verum etiam pro omnibus actualibus hominum peccatis." So also in The Institution of a Christian Man we read, "Now I may boidly say and believe, as indeed I do perfectly believe, that by His Passiou...Christ hath made a sufficient expiation or propitiation towards God, that is to say, a sufficient satisfaction and recompense as well for my original sin, as also for all the actual sins that ever I have committed, and from the everlasting pain due for the same." Formularies of Faith, Henry VIII., p. 35.

Man, He said, came not to be ministered unto. but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many1 (Matt. xx. 28). S. Paul also frequently uses the figure. In one place he says that our Lord gave Himself a ransom in behalf of all2 (I Tim. ii. 6); in another he states that He is our redemption (I Cor. i. 30); and in vet another, that in Him we have our redemption through His Blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses (Eph. i. 7). For man, having fallen into sin and become the servant of sin (John viii. 34), could not redeem himself from its guilt and consequences. He had no ransom, which he could offer to God for his sin. But what he could not pay himself, that of His "tender love towards mankind3" God the Father gave His only-begotten Son to pay for man, and out of the same "tender love" the Son consented to pay it for man, and constituted Himself man's surety. To undertake this work of unimaginable condescension He Himself "became Man," and in man's nature lived a life of perfect

Matthew are the only two passages where the word λύτρον occurs in the Gospels. But several words group themselves round this idea of λύτρον, a ransom. Thus we have (1) the verb λυτροῦν=to ransom (Luke xxiv. 21); (ii) the substantive λυτρωτής=a ransomer or redemer applied to Moses (Acts vii. 35); (iii) λυτρωσιs=the act of ransoning or redemption (Luke i. 68; ii. 38), and this is applied in Heb. ix. 12, to the eternal redemption wrought out by Christ, aἰωνίων λύτρωσν εὐράμενος.

3 "To the Jews of our Lord's day the idea of a 'ransom' was quite familiar, and the Law had regulated ransoms with much minuteness, whether for the redemption of a slave (Lev. xxv. 47–49), the life of the firstborn child (Num. xviii. 16), or the possession of an inheritance (Lev. xxv. 25–27). Ransoms were usually paid in money, but in a certain large class of cases the sacrifice of the life of one creature redeemed another from death (Exod. xiii. 13; xxxiv. 20; Num. xviii. 15)." Dr Dale, The Atonement, p. 76.

and absolute obedience to His Father's will, and offered up on the Cross that perfectly unblemished life as an all-sufficient "ransom" for many<sup>1</sup>, and so redeemed all mankind alike from the power and from the consequences of sin.

The Perfect Propitiation. The second figure employed is that of a Sin-offering or Propitiation. The Greek word thus translated, Ίλασμός, only occurs in the writings of S. John. Christ, says that Apostle, is the propitiation for our sins2 (I John iv. 10). The term is specially applicable to our Lord's work upon the Cross, because it is He, Who, as the all-perfect sacrifice, has covered or expiated the sin of the world. The idea is brought out in several passages. Thus, when the Baptist sees our Lord coming up from the scene of His temptation, he exclaims, Behold, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world (John i. 29, 36). When our Lord gives to His Apostles the Cup at the institution of the Holy Eucharist, He says, This is My Blood of the Covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins (Matt. xxvi. 28). By this He intimated that He was about to be a sin-offering, and His Blood was about to be shed for the remission of sins. The oblation He offered was not the arbitrary substitution of one innocent Man for a guilty race<sup>1</sup>. He, the Eternal Son of God, Himself became Man, and so, when He suffered upon the Cross, our Nature suffered in Him<sup>2</sup>, for all humanity was not only represented by but gathered up in Him. By the offering up of His sinless Self, He bare our sins in His own Body on the tree (I Pet. ii. 24), and by the transcendent merit of His sacrifice He made expiation for the sins of entire humanity.

Heb. viii. 12), whence come also (i) the verb  $l\lambda d\sigma \kappa \epsilon \sigma \theta a\iota$ , which means (a) to be propitious towards one (Luke xviii. 13), (b) to make propitiation for one (Heb. ii. 17); (ii) the substantive  $l\lambda a\sigma \tau \eta \rho \iota o\nu$ , which denotes (a) the mercy-seat of the ark,  $X \epsilon \rho \iota \nu \beta l \mu$  δόξης κατασκιάζοντα τὸ  $l\lambda a\sigma \tau \eta \rho \iota o\nu$  (Heb. ix. 5), (b) a propitiation, δν προέθετο δ θεὸς  $l\lambda a\sigma \tau \eta \rho \iota \iota o\nu$  αντοῦ αζματι (Rom. iii. 25).

(3) The Perfect Satisfaction. The third term employed in the Article is one which is not found in the Greek Testament. Satisfaction, from the Latin satisfactio, is a word used in the processes of Roman civil law<sup>3</sup>, and in Classical Latin denoted the liquidation of a debt, or the offering an apology for some wrong done<sup>4</sup>. Employed first as an ecclesiastical expression

1 "Our Redeemer cannot be substituted for man; He is Man. One thing cannot be put in the stead of another unless it distinctly is another. But our Lord is not another. He has made Himself one with us. He has gathered us up into Himself." Mason, Faith of the Gospel, p. 208, Ed. 1889.

by Tertullian, it was afterwards greatly developed by S. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury1. He lays it down that either punishment or satisfaction must follow every sin: that man's sin was so great that God alone could pay the debt he owed; therefore One must pay it Who is God and Man. Hence arose the necessity for the Incarnation. But the Incarnation itself was not all. The life of spotless obedience which followed, and the Death, by which that life of obedience was crowned, paid in infinitely superabundant measure the debt, which man owed to the Justice and Holiness of God2. Thus "the infinite worth of the Son of God3" dying for man and in man's nature, wrought out a perfect satisfaction for human sin, and availed to do that for man, which he alone and unaided could not have done for himself

vi. The Second Clause of the Article asserts that besides this offering of Christ there can be none other satisfaction for sin. Offered by the Son of God Himself, this Sacrifice stands absolutely alone in the world. It is singular and unique as regards (1) the Victim, the spotless Lamb of God4; as regards (ii) the act, His voluntary sub-

Virgin but the Son of God ... and no other person, crucified; which one only point of Christian belief, the infinite worth of the Son of God, is the very ground of all things believed concerning life and salvation by that which Christ either did or suffered as Man in our behalf." Hooker, Eccl.

<sup>1</sup> The word "satisfaction" occurs in the Collect for the 4th Sunday in Advent, and in the Communion Office we assert that by His one oblation of Himself once offered our Lord has made "a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction"

mission to death for man; and as regards (iii) the result. the accomplishment by Him of a perfect expiation of all the sins, both original and actual, of entire humanity1. This one Sacrifice of the Son of God was offered once for all. This is the point, on which the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews insists so strongly, when he says that every priest under the Law standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, the which can never take away sins2: but He, when He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God3 (Heb. x. 11, 12). These words make it clear that the Sacrifice of Christ was efficacious for ever, and through all time, and is incapable of repetition, that once made, it lives on in heaven, and our Ascended Lord pleads it, generation after generation, for each one of our sinful race. It cannot be denied that the language of this passage from the Epistle fully justifies the anxiety manifested in the Article that nothing should seem to overshadow the one Sacrifice of our Lord once made in humiliation upon the Cross, and continually presented in Glory within the veil4.

1 "Non mors, sed voluntas placuit sponte morientis, et illa morte expungentis mortem, operantis salutem, restituentis innocentiam, triumphantis principatus et potestates, spoliantis inferos, ditantis superos, pacificantis quæ in cœlo sunt et quæ in terra, omnia instaurantis." S. Bernard, De Erroribus Abælardi, viii. (21).

<sup>2</sup> Altrives οὐδέποτε δύνανται περιελεῖν ἀμαρτίας, which are such that they can never take away sin, Lat. auferre peccata. The expressive word περιελεῖν expresses the stripping off the terrible cobe of sin, which man has woven round himself.

"The sacrifice was refficacious for ever, through all time, being appropriated by each believer. The connexion of els τὸ διηνεκές with the following ἐκάθισεν (for ever sat down) is contrary to the usage of the Epistle; it weakens the contrast with ἔστηκεν; and it imports a foreign idea into the image of the assumption (ἐκάθισεν) of royal dignity by Christ." Bp Westcott in loc.

4 Hence we can understand the

4 Hence we can understand the emphasis with which Bullinger says in 1550, and dedicated to Edward VI., "Itaque relinquitur jam indubitatum Christum Dominum plenariam esse propitiationem, satisfactionem, hostiamque ac victimam pro peccatis (pro

vii. The Third Clause. It is natural that having dealt with this point the Article should proceed to treat of "the sacrifices of Masses, in the which it was commonly said, that the Priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt." It is to be noticed that the Latin is not "Missæ sacrificium," "the sacrifice of the Mass," but "Missarum sacrificia," "the sacrifices of Masses." The expression "sacrifices of Masses." generally meant in the language of the sixteenth century "private Masses," which were said for the sake of gain, and were a source of much profit1. Respecting these "sacrifices of Masses" it is to be noticed that the Article is concerned with what was "commonly said" respecting them. "This," it has been truly observed, "is a strictly historical mode of speaking of what the authors of the Articles knew to have been in force in time past and saw before their eyes2." Now it was commonly held in the sixteenth century that the Body of Christ was once offered upon the Cross for original's sin, but is continually offered on pœna, inquam, et pro culpa) totius mundi, et quidem solam. Non est enim in alio quoquam salus." Quoted in Laurence's Bampton Lectures, p.

Thus Cranmer contrasts "the many Masses every day," "the daily private Masses," "the selling Masses," aday. with the one common Mass in a day. Defence of the Catholic Doctrine, v. 16. "These private Masses," he writes again, "sprang of lucre and gain, when priests found the means to sell Masses to the people, which caused Masses so much to increase, that every day was said an infinite number, and that no priest would receive the Communion at another priest's hand, but every one would receive it alone." Cranmer, On the Lord's Supper, p. 353, Parker Soc.

Newman, Tract XC., p. 62. 3 This view seems to have been first propounded by Albertus Magnus, who writes, "Secunda causa institutionis hujus Sacramenti est sacrificium Altaris, contra quamdam quotidianam delictorum nostrorum rapinam; ut sicut Corpus Domini nostri semel oblatum est pro delicto originali, sic offeratur jugiter pro nostris quotidianis delictis in altari, et habeat in hoc Ecclesia munus ad placandum sibi Deum, super omnia legis sacramenta Sermo 1 de Sacramento Eucharistia, Alberti Magni Opera, tom. xii., p. 250, quoted in Denny and Lacey's De Hierarchia Anglicana, p. 128. So also Ambrosius Catharinus, "inter doctores Tridentinos, eminentissimus," commenting on Heb. x., writes, "Apparet quod pro peccatis sub Novo Testamento post acceptam salutaris hostiæ in baptismo efficaciam commissis, non habemus pro peccato the altar for actual sin. This suggested that the Unbloody Sacrifice of the Mass had a propitiatory value of its own, independent of, and additional to, the Bloody Sacrifice of the Cross¹. It was also held that particular, special, Masses were more profitable to souls than "the one common Mass," and whereas the suffrages of the Church benefited those most, who most deserved to be benefited, those offered specially benefited those most for whom they were performed, specially the Masses, which were offered for departed souls². Thus the idea of a propitiatory sacrifice in the Mass, valid independently of the Sacrifice of the Cross, was accentuated by these private Masses, and they naturally became a potent source of gain to the Priests who offered them. This is what the Article distinctly and energetically repudiates. It affirms that it is a "blasphemous hostiam illam, quam Christus obtulit pro peccato mundi, et pro delictis baptismum præcedentibus." See De Hierarchia Anglicana, p. 130. Bp Jewel quotes Catharinus in his Defence of the Apology, Works, Vol. iii., p. 451, Parker Soc. See also the present Bp of Salisbury's pamphlet De Validitate Ordinum Anglicanorum, p. 9, Ed. 1894.

1 For the preaching of this doctrine on the Continent compare the words of Luther, "Cur jam aperte concionentur, pro peccatis post Baptismum commissis Christum non satisfecisse, sed tantum pro culpa originali." Conciones ad 16 Joann. Comp. also the Augsburg Confession; "accessit opinio quæ auxit privatas Missas in infinitum, videlicet quod Christus sua passione satisfecerit pro peccato originis, et instituerit Missam, in qua fieret oblatio pro quotidianis delictis, mortalibus et venialibus. Hinc manavit publica opinio, quod Missa sit opus delens peccata vivorum et mortuorum." Sylloge Confessionum, p. 139. That similar doctrine was taught in England is clear from Latimer's Sermons: "For whereas Christ, according as the serpent was lifted up in the wilderness, so would He himself be exalted, that thereby as many as trusted in Him should have salvation; but the devil would none of that: they would have us saved by a daily oblation propitiatory, by a sacrifice expiatory or remissory." Sermons, pp. 72, 73, Parker Soc. And again in a Sermon preached before Convocation in 1536 he speaks of those, "Who preached to the people the Redemption that cometh by Christ's death to serve only them that died before His coming, that were in the time of the Old Testament, and that now since redemption and forgiveness of sins purchased by money and devised by men is of efficacy, and not redemption purchased by Christ." Latimer, Sermons, p. 36, ed. Parker fable" to teach that there is a sacrifice for sin other than the Death of Christ, and that Masses are that sacrifice<sup>1</sup>, introducing a second and continually recurrent atonement, or, as Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, expressed it, a "new redemption<sup>2</sup>." It further affirms that it is a "pernicious imposture" to turn this doctrine into a means of making gain, into a source of emolument for those who celebrate these Masses.

viii. Conclusion. Thus the Article lays down with striking emphasis that the Sacrifice of Christ upon the Cross is "the perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction," "not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men." This implies that the Eucharistic Sacrifice can in no sense possess anything propitiatory in itself independently of that one Sacrifice; that it can only apply what was once and for all merited by that Sacrifice<sup>3</sup>.

1 "Art. XXXI. rejects the vulgar idea of the priest's offering Christ at every celebration for the living and the dead, with a view to the remission of pain or guilt, and in his repeating the offering of Christ made once for all (as the first part of the Article declares) every time he offers Christ, and this as again procuring each time the grace of the one offering of Christ." Prof. Friedrich in Jan. No. of The International Theological Review, p. 11, 1895.

© Compare a Sermon of his preached on the Festival of S. Peter, 1548. "For when men add unto the Mass an opinion of satisfaction or of a new redemption, then do they put it to another use than it was ordained for." See Foxe, Acts and Monuments, pp. 772, 773; Dixon, Hist. of Ch. of England, iii. p. 264, Ed. 1893. Gardiner could write strongly in 1531 on the all-sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice of Himself: "This is agreed," he says, "and by the Scriptures plainly taught, that the oblation and sacrifice of our Saviour Christ was and is a perfect work, once consummate in perfection without necessity of reiteration, as it was never taught to be reiterate, but a mere blasphemy to presuppose it." See Abp Cranmer's Works, On the Lord's Supper, P. S., p. 344. The teaching of the Bishop agrees with the statement agreed to at the Bonn Conference in 1874, "The Eucharistic Celebration in the Church is not a continuous repetition or renewal of the Propitiatory Sacrifice offered once for ever by Christ upon the Cross; but its sacrificial character consists in this, that it is the permanent memorial of it, and a re-presentation and presentation on earth of that One oblation of Christ for the salvation of redeemed mankind, which according to the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 11, 12) is continuously presented in the presence of God for us" (ix. 24).

The idea condemned in the Article

<sup>3</sup> The idea condemned in the Article is that of the value of many Masses, as separate acts of sacrifice independent of the Sacrifice of the Cross, the one

As regards "the sacrifices of Masses" the language is to be understood as referring to the special doctrine which it is opposing<sup>1</sup>, and, though strong, is not more strong than that of an Ultra-montanist Bishop of the 14th century, when he says, "Our Church is full and overfull of altars, masses, and sacrifices, and therewith, in them that sacrifice, it is full of homicides, sacrileges, uncleanness, and simonies, and other wickednesses, excommunications, and irregularities to the very utmost. For to this day so many masses are said for gain, or custom, or complaisance, or to cover wickednesses<sup>2</sup>, or for their own justification, that both amongst priests and people the holy Body of the Lord is now held cheap. Whence also S. Francis willed that the brothers everywhere should be content with one Mass, foreseeing that the brethren would wish to justify them-only-availing Sacrifice. Hence the force of the second clause, "Where-fore the sacrifices of Masses..." The One Sacrifice of our Lord and its allsufficient merits live on as in our Lord's perpetual presentation of Himself in heaven. So in the Eucharistic Sacrifice "we have nothing apart from that One Sacrifice; our Eucharistic Oblation is not something in and for itself; something independent of that One Sacrifice, even while it pleaded it. Such is its union with that Sacrifice, that it is a perpetual application of its virtue; yet not as something distinct, but united with it through the oneness of that which is offered." Bp Forbes, On the Articles, pp. 615, 616. "What we dare not say," writes Bramhall, "is that the Holy Eucharist is a sacrifice propitiatory in itself, by its own proper virtue and expiatory efficacy. Whatsoever power it hath, is in relation to the Sacrifice of Christ, as a means ordained to apply that to true believers." Bramhall, Works, Vol. v. Oxford 1845.

<sup>1</sup> Compare the language of the Homilies, "What dens of thieves the Churches of England have been made by the blasphemous buying and selling the most precious body and blood of Christ in the Mass, as the world was made to believe at diriges, at months' minds, in trentalls, in abbeys and chantries." Homily On Repairing and Keeping Clean of Churches, p. 277, Cambridge 1850.

selves by Masses, and reduce them to a matter of gain as we see done at this day?"

1 "Why must a solitary mass, bought for a piece of money, performed and participated by a priest alone, in a private corner of a Church, be, not only against the sense of Scripture and the Primitive Church, but also against common sense and grammar, called a Communion, and be accounted useful to him that buys it, though he never himself receive the Sacrament, or but once a year; but for this reason. that there is great gain, but no godliness at all, in this doctrine?" Bp Bull's Sermons, Works, Vol. i. p. 13, Oxford 1846. "The world was made believe, that by the virtue of so many masses, which were to be purchased by great endowments, souls were redeemed out of purgatory, and scenes of visions and apparitions, sometimes of the tormented, sometimes of the delivered souls, were published in the places; which had so wonderful an effect, that in two or three centuries, endowments increased to a vast extent...the practices by which this was managed, and the effects that followed on it, we can call by no other name than downright impostures; worse than the making or vending false coin: when the world was drawn in by such arts to plain bargains to redeem their own souls, and the souls of their ancestors and posterity, so many masses are to be said, and forfeitures were to follow upon their not being said: thus the masses were really the price of the lands," Bp Burnet On Article XXII., p. 251, Oxford 1845.

2 "Nostra autem Ecclesia plena et supplena est altaribus, missis et sacrificiis, sed cum hoc plena in sacrificantibus homicidiis, sacrilegiis et immunditiis, et simoniis, et aliis sceleribus, excommunicationibus et irregularitatibus usque ad summum...Tot enim hodie dicuntur missæ quasi quæstuariæ vel consuetudinariæ vel ad complacentiam vel ad scelera cooperienda vel propriam justificationem, quod apud populum vel clerum Sacrosanctum Corpus Domini jam vilescit... Unde et almus Franciscus voluit quod in quocunque loco fratres contenti essent una missa, prospiciens fratres se velle justificare per missas, et ad quæstum eas reducere sicut videmus hodie fieri." Alvarus Pelagius, De Planctu Ecclesiæ, ii. 5, quoted by Pusey, Truth and Office of the English Church, p. 30. Alvarus Pelagius was a Penitentiary of Pope John XXII.

Therefore it is lawfull also for them, as for all other Christian men, to mary at their owne discretion, as they shall iudge the same to serue better to godlynesse.

- i. Connection. At first sight it seems a violent transition from the subject treated of in the last Article to the question of the celibacy of the Clergy. But the transition is not really so violent as it seems. A superstitious belief as to the sacrificial function of the Priesthood is not very far removed from the notion that admission to the Sacred Ministry is to be denied to all such as are not separated from their fellow-men by the vow of celibacy.
- ii. Title and Language. Both the Title and Language of the Article have undergone a change. The original Latin title in 1553 was Cælibatus ex verbo Dei præcipitur nemini, or, in English, "The state of single life is commaunded to no man by the worde of God." This was altered in 1563 to "De Coniugic Sacerdotum" "Of the marriage of Priestes." Moreover whereas the Article originally consisted of a single clause containing a negative statement that the state of single life without marriage is not enjoined to be vowed by Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, nor are they by God's law compelled to abstain from Matrimony; this was strengthened in 1563 by the positive additional statement that it is lawful for them, as for all other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion, as it may seem to serve better to godliness1.

iii. Early History. In the earliest and purest ages of the Church the idea of prohibiting Clerical marriage does not seem to have occurred to the minds of the holiest of men. Thus (a) S. Polycarp speaks of Valens, a Priest. and his wife, as though the fact was by no means strange?. (b) Eusebius mentions Chæremon, Bishop of Nilus, a man of great age, as flying from the Decian persecution together with his wife3, and tells us how, during the Diocletian persecution, Bishops and Priests were urged to have pity on their wives and children, and for their sakes to offer sacrifice4. (c) Before long, however, an exaggerated esteem for celibacy crept into the Church, but it was opposed by Councils and Canons. Thus the Council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, decreed that those, who, at the time of Ordination as Deacons, declared their intention to marry, should be allowed to do so, and to remain in the Ministry, but it forbade the marriage of those, who at the time of Ordination bound themselves by vows of continence. Again, the very important Council of Gangra, A.D. 314, anathematises those who hold aloof from the ministrations at the Holy Communion of a married Priest. (d) An attempt was indeed made to enforce celibacy on the Clergy at the Council of Nicæa, A.D. 325, but it was frustrated by the firmness of Paphnutius, an eminent Egyptian prelate, himself unmarried, who earnestly protested against putting so heavy a burden on the Clergy, saying it ought to suffice that they should not marry after Ordination, and should not be required to separate from their wives.

iv. Later Developments. Gradually, however, the spirit which at first exhibited itself only to be condemned in heretical communities2, stifled the healthier feeling, and at length the liberty not only of cohabiting with but of having wives was refused, so far as Bishops were concerned, in the East and West alike. In the case of Priests the practice of the two halves of Christendom became more and more divergent. In the East Bishops were required to observe celibacy, but Priests and Deacons might live with their wives. In the West the rule against Clerical marriage grew more and more rigid, Spain leading the way. But there was a long struggle between the natural feelings of the Clergy and the increasing rigour of Church discipline. In 1074 Gregory VII. held a Council at Rome which condemned the marriage of Priests under the name of concubinage. Two years afterwards Archbishop Lanfranc held a synod of English Bishops at Winchester, which forbade Canons to have wives, and decreed that in future tinence. It was far however from receiving universal obedience. "The great Church of Milan, claiming the authority of its greatest bishop, S. Ambrose, and bearing the repute of having the best clergy in Italy, was content with the ancient rule which permitted only one marriage to a cleric": Cheetham, First Six Centuries, p. 351; see also Milman's Latin Christianity, Bk. vi., c. 3.

Priests should not marry; while such Priests as lived in the country and were already married, might retain their wives<sup>1</sup>. Under Anselm, the successor of Lanfranc, it was finally decreed A.D. 1102 that in England no one should be ordained either Priest, Deacon, or Sub-deacon who did not profess celibacy, and this decree was confirmed by the Council of London, A.D. 1108<sup>2</sup>.

v. The Teaching of Scripture. When we ask what is the teaching of Scripture on the subject we notice that in the Old Testament times the Priests were not only allowed, but encouraged to marry (Levit. xxi. 13, 14). Moreover the office even of the High-priest was made hereditary, and he was confined in the choice of a wife to a virgin belonging to his own people (Levit. xxi. 13)3. In the New Testament, whereas, considering the awfulness of His Mission, we might have expected that our Lord would have imitated the example of John the Baptist and inculcated the extremest asceticism, we find that He committed the keys of His Kingdom to S. Peter, who was himself a married man (Mark i. 30), and He was pleased to perform His first miracle at a marriage-feast in Cana of Galilee (John ii. I—II). In Apostolic times we find S. Paul affirming that what was true of S. Peter was true from marrying prostitutes and divorced women (Levit. xxi. 7). According to the spirit of the Mosaic economy, marriage was regarded as the indispensable duty of every man, nor was it imagined that it involved any drawback to the attainment of a high degree of holiness. The Essenes were the first to propound any doubts as to the propriety of marriage. Some of them avoided it altogether, others availed themselves of it under special restrictions. Similar views were held by the Therapeutæ.

Wilkin's Concil., i. p. 367; Gieseler, Church History, iii. 205—207, n. 4. "The marriage of the clergy discredited on every hand, was gradually disused, and died away entirely at the middle of the thirteenth century." Hardwick, Middle Age, p. 241.

3 The priests were not so much restricted in their choice as the High-priest. They were only prohibited also of the other Apostles and the brethren of the Lord1 (1 Cor. ix. 5). Further in his Pastoral Epistles he evidently assumes that the Ministers of the Church may rightly be married men (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), and he lays down special rules concerning the conduct of their wives (I Tim. iii. 11), and the management of the children and household (I Tim. iii. 4). Moreover he makes the forbidding to marry a sign of the apostasy of the latter days, and as having its origin in the hypocrisy of men that speak lies, seared in their own conscience as with a hot iron (I Tim. iv. 2, 3), while on the other hand he speaks of marriage as consecrated to "such an excellent mystery, that in it is signified and represented the spiritual marriage and unity betwixt Christ and His Church" (Eph. v. 23-32). Unless, then, we are to suppose that S. Paul was mistaken from the outset, it is clear that he did not consider that estate to be unfit for the Christian Priesthood, which Christ Himself had honoured with the glory of His first miracle?.

vi. Special Passages. There are, indeed, passages of Scripture which appear to give a preference to the single rather than the married life. Thus after our Lord on one occasion had condemned the too common facility of divorce, and had declared the marriage tie inviolable, the disciples remarked that, this being so, it was not expedient to marry<sup>3</sup> (Matt. xix. 10). In reply our Lord did not say it was not expedient. He simply remarked that all men could not receive this saying (Matt. xix. 11), and abstained from laying down any universal rule. And similarly S. Paul,

3 Nothing could more clearly prove the revolution in thought brought to pass by Christ than this. Even the disciples feel that such a principle would make the yoke of marriage unbearable.

while he tells the Corinthians that under certain circumstances it would be good for a man to remain unmarried (I Cor. vii. I), yet has no idea of imposing on whole bodies of men that which his Master said all men could not receive. He admits that every man hath his own gift from God, one after this manner, and another after that (I Cor. vii. 7), and declares that he has no desire to cast a snare on the conscience of any man, or to strain human nature beyond what it can bear (I Cor. vii. 35).

vii. Conclusion. The proposition, then, that the celibacy of the Priesthood is not commanded by God's Law is absolutely primitive and Catholic. "It has ever been regarded as a matter of pure discipline, varying with the different ages and the divers necessities of the Church1." The Article claims for the Clergy the same freedom as is allowed the people, the same freedom as was conceded under the Jewish Law. But it by no means regards Clerical marriage as a matter of course. It leaves the ultimate decision to the individual conscience, and the question for each person to solve is whether marriage is likely or not to promote the spiritual life2. Our Lord spoke of continence as a Grace given to a few, and it is clear that He would commend those, who embrace voluntarily whatever privation single life involves in order to yield themselves more effectually a living sacrifice to duty and to God3. What the Article plainly implies is the need of long and prayerful consideration, in each individual case, as to how far the married state is likely to contribute to the life's work of one who is to be an example unto the flock which "Christ purchased for Himself with His own Blood."

Excommunicati uitandi sunt.

That person whiche by open denutiation of the Churche, is ryghtly cut of from the vnitie of the Churche, and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faythfull as an Heathen and Publicane, vntill he be openly reconciled by penaunce, and receaued into the Churche by a judge that hath aucthoritie thereto.

- i. Source and Language. The Thirty-third Article is based on the Fifth Article of the Augsburg Confession, and in language has undergone no change since the first draft in 1553.
- ii. The Object. Its object is to settle questions which arose in the xvith century respecting internal discipline, a topic which excited the most vehement disputation in the reign of Edward VI<sup>1</sup>. For several sects of disordered spiritualists, setting at naught the letter of Holy Scripture, professed to have reached such a stage of perfection, that they were beyond all need of discipline.
- iii. Analysis. The question as to the right of the Church to exercise discipline is not raised in the Article. It is assumed, and the only point discussed is the way in which it is to be carried out. It affirms that:—

- (i) He who by open denunciation...is rightly cut off from the unity of the Church and excommunicated, "ought to be regarded by the whole body of the faithful as a heathen man and a publican; and that
- (ii) He is to be so regarded, until he be openly reconciled by penance and received into the Church by a Judge that hath authority thereunto."
- iv. Jewish Excommunication. Under the Jewish Law there were three kinds of excommunication:
  - (a) One of the simplest description, involving exclusion from the congregation for a period of a month, or, in the event of impenitence, two or three months<sup>1</sup>.
  - (b) A second, or more severe kind, accompanied with imprecations from Deut. xxviii. and other places of Scripture<sup>2</sup>:
  - (c) The third and heaviest form, involving total expulsion from the Synagogue, and handing over to the power of the Evil One<sup>3</sup>.
- v. In the New Testament we find our Lord laying down three courses to be observed in the case of offences. He enjoins that if a brother sin against another, (i) The party, who deems himself offended, is to tell the other privately of the matter which has caused offence; (ii) If this fails, there is to be reprehension before two or three witnesses; (iii) In the event of continued refusal to be posed to allude in I Cor. v. II.

reconciled, then the offended party is to tell the matter to the Church, and, if there be still no signs of penitence, the offender is to be no longer regarded as a Christian, but as a heathen man and a publican (Matt. xviii. 15—17).

- vi. Apostolic Practice. In accordance with these regulations we find S. Paul in the case of the incestuous person at Corinth enjoining the members of the Church there to assemble together in the Name of the Lord Jesus (I Cor. v. 4), and while he himself is with them in spirit, to deliver over the offender to Satan for the destruction of his flesh, that his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus (I Cor. v. 4, 5). And when the incestuous man repents, the same Apostle enjoins the Corinthians to restore and forgive him, and promises that whosoever they forgive he will forgive also (2 Cor. ii. 5-11). Again, he threatens to enquire judicially into the case of certain persons in the same Church, and to deal sharply with them according to the power which the Lord had given him (2 Cor. xiii. 10). Thus also he informs Timothy that he had himself excommunicated Hymenæus and Alexander (I Tim. i. 20), and he gives directions to him and to Titus how they are to judge, rebuke, and reject wherever necessary (1 Tim. v. 19-21; Tit. iii. 10, 11).
- vii. Christian Excommunication. That the example of S. Paul should be followed in the early Church was only natural, and we find that, as amongst the Jews, the exercise of discipline was carried out on a graduated scale: (a) The more lenient form consisted of separation from the Holy Eucharist and from the prayers of the faithful, but it did not exclude the offender wholly from the Church; (b) an intermediate form excluded the offender for a longer period than the first; (c) the great Excommunication, called "Anathema," involved a total exclusion from all Church communion and from all Christian privileges<sup>1</sup>. The Judge or Officer, who was empowered by the early Church to impose and remove<sup>2</sup> the penalties of Excommunication was the Bishop. But during the Middle Ages this power was claimed almost exclusively for the Popes, and in their hands acquired a new and terrible meaning. Of this we have prominent examples in the Excommunication of the Emperor Henry IV. by Pope Gregory VII., and the Interdict, under which all England was laid in the reign of John by Pope Innocent III.

viii. The Reformers generally recognised the power of Excommunication, as is proved by the statement contained in the Augsburg and Saxon Confessions. Calvin was a very strict asserter of this authority on the part of the Church, and divided it into (1) private monition, (2) reprehension before witnesses, (3) exclusion from the Holy Communion, humiliation before God, and open confession before the Church<sup>3</sup>. In our own Church we have in the Commination Service the recitation of the doom of wilful sinners as contained in Deut, xxviii. 11-264, and the Rubric before the Holy Communion directs the Priest to repel notorious and evil livers from participation in that Holy Feast, provided that he at once acquaints the Bishop of the fact of his so doing. The Excommunication contemplated in the Article is that known as "the greater Excommunication." It can never be inflicted except by a Judge in a properly constituted Ecclesiastical court, and

3 Calvin, Instit. iv. xii. 2. This

Reformer exempted no one, not even the sovereign, from such censures, and he quotes the case of Theodosius excommunicated by S. Ambrose as a precedent for rigour in all cases.

this is implied by the words "rightly cut off'," that is in a formal and regular manner, and even now the power of these courts to excommunicate, and even to order penance for living in incest, adultery, or fornication has not been entirely taken away<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> The words "openly reconciled by penance" remind us of the fact that Excommunication has a common origin with the Sacrament of Penance. Both are distinctively judicial functions of the Church. In the early days the sense that sin was an offence against the corporate body was, naturally, very strong. Moreover, it was regarded as the charitable office of the Church to correct erring members, and not to leave them to their own unaided efforts. For such purposes the Church had been entrusted with the power to remit and to retain sins. At first this power was probably only exercised publicly by the Bishop. Later, under the conditions of an Ecclesiastical world at once larger and more lax, the discipline of the Church was administered, in ordinary cases, in private and by Priests, while special cases were referred to the Bishop and sometimes also dealt with publicly. The custom of the Roman Church to limit the right to administer the Sacrament of Penance to Priests licensed by the Bishop to administer it within a given sphere, emphasizes its character as being that of a judicial tribunal representative of the Church.

Law, p. 1375.

- i. Origin. The Thirty-fourth Article is derived from the Fifth of the Thirteen Articles of 1538<sup>1</sup>, which contains many of the expressions incorporated in the former.
- 1 "Traditiones vero et ritus atque caremonia, quæ vel ad decorem vel ordinem vel disciplinam Ecclesiæ ab hominibus sunt institutæ, non omnino necesse est ut eedem sint ubique aut

ii. Language. As originally drafted in 1553 it consisted of only two clauses, the present first and second. The third clause was not added till 1563, after the Council of Trent had so far sought to annihilate the distinction of National Churches, as to introduce a uniformity, not only of doctrine, but also of ceremonial and of discipline throughout the West<sup>1</sup>.

iii. Object. While, then, it asserts in opposition to the teaching of the Anabaptists that (1) Church traditions<sup>2</sup>, ceremonies, rites and customs ought not to be violated at the impulse of man's private judgment, and that (2) private persons are not justified of their own will in breaking the traditions and ceremonies of the Church, so long as they are not repugnant to God's Word3, it stoutly affirms that

ing paragraph is written on a loose slip of paper, as if subsequently added: 'Hæ enim et variæ fuere, et variari possunt pro regionum et morum diversitate, ubi decus decensque ordo principibus rectoribusque regionum videbuntur postulare; ita tamen ut nihil varietur aut instituatur contra verbum Dei manifestum.' Hardwick, Hist. of Articles, Appendix II. p. 264.

<sup>1</sup> The question of "the indeterminate and ever-widening authority which the Popes asserted over the kingdoms and Churches of the West" had been submitted to the judgment of Western Christendom so early as the Council of Pisa in 1409. The national and conciliar or anti-Papal view had been boldly urged by such great Gallicans as Gerson and Peter d'Ailly, and it is interesting to note the strength of their position in the fact that at the Council of Constance in 1414 the votes of those present were given by nations and not individually; but at the Council of Basel in 1437 the position was reversed, "its method of procedure ran counter to the new direction which had been communicated to European federacy by the action of the Constance congress," and thus the way was paved for the final triumph of Pontifical Absolutism at the conclusion of the Council of Trent in 1563. Compare Symonds, Renaissance in Italy, The Catholic Reaction, Pt. 1. pp. 98 sqq.

2"The word 'tradition' in the sense in which the Article means it to be taken, is synonymous with the term 'consuetudo,' meaning such a custom as is produced by the simultaneous and frequent action of the greater part of a community." Bp. Forbes, On the Articles, p. 670. Compare the answer of Gregory the Great to the second Interrogation of S. Augustine, "Ex singulis ergo quibusque Ecclesiis, quæ pia, quæ religiosa, quæ recta sunt elige, et hæc quasi in fasciculum collecta apud Anglorum mentes in consuetudinem depone." Hist. Eccl. ii. 27.

3 "That paramount authority of Holy Scripture, which is so remarkable a characteristic of the Thirty-nine Articles, and which the Church of England inherited from the great teachers of the Middle Ages, supplies the limit to the diversity of the traditions of the

- (3) "every particular or National Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority, provided only that all things be done to edifying."
- iv. The Teaching of Scripture gives us two principles of Ecclesiastical observance, first, that it must be related to the great end of building up Christian character and, then, that its method must be both suitable and restrained. For S. Paul lays it down as a general rule that all things should be done unto edifying (I Cor. xiv. 26), and that in church everything should be done decently and in order (I Cor. xiv. 40).
- v. The Teaching of Church History makes it plain that the different Churches, though wonderfully concordant in doctrine and Apostolical government, yet exhibited great variety in discipline and ritual. Thus
  - (α) The Eastern and Western Churches differed as regards the time of keeping Easter. The Western Churches keeping it as we keep it now, so that it always falls on a Sunday, while the Churches of Asia commemorated the Crucifixion on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, after the manner of the Jewish Passover, on whatever day of the week it might fall, and the Resurrection on the sixteenth.
  - (β) The Church of Rome differed from the Church of Africa on so important a question as the Church." Bp. Forbes, On the Articles, p.672. The limitations to the influence of such consuetudo is suggested by Cyprian's attitude towards Pope Stephen in respect of the re-baptism of heretics: "Proinde frustra quidem qui ratione vincuntur consuetudinem nobis opponunt; quasi consuetudo major sit veritute, aut id sit in spiritu-

re-baptism of heretics. While Cyprian and the African Bishops maintained that those who had been baptized by heretics ought to be rebaptized, Pope Stephen and the Roman Church maintained that such Baptism was valid, and therefore could not be repeated.

- (γ) Again, Churches differed as to the mode in which the Jewish Sabbath ought to be treated, some observing the Lord's Day only, others the Saturday and Jewish Sabbath also; some were wont to fast on Friday<sup>3</sup>, the day of our Lord's Crucifixion, others on Friday and Saturday also, as the day on which the Lord lay in the grave<sup>4</sup>.
- (δ) Once more, each Bishop was allowed to frame his own Liturgy, and hence we have the Liturgies of Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, Rome, Gaul, and Spain, in which while certain characteristics remain constant,

1 "The same view was held in Asia Minor, Alexandria, and many other Eastern Churches, and was sanctioned by a series of provincial Synods at Carthage, Iconium, and Synnada." Cheetham's First Six Centuries, p. 153.

<sup>2</sup> For Stephen's keen opposition to Cyprian on the point see Fermilian's letter to Cyprian, Cyp. Epist. 75, c. 28. The contest was an obstinate one and outlived both the principal combatants. Gradually the Roman practice prevailed, and was sanctioned at the Synod of Arles in the year 314. Hardouin's Conc., i. 265.

Hardouin's Conc., i. 265.

<sup>3</sup> Especially those of the Patriarchate of Antioch. There was a marked difference in manner between those who did observe the Saturday. In the East it was customary to observe it as a Festival, in the West as a Fast. "Alii, sicut maxime populi Orientis, propter requiem significandam mallent relaxare jejunium, alii propter humilitatem mortis Domini jejunare, sicut Romana et nonnullæ Occidentis Ecclesiæ." S. Aug. ad Casulam, Ep. xxxvi; cf. Bingham Antioq. xx. (3) 5, 6. Hence we have the statement of S. Augustine respecting the custom of S. Ambrose: "Cum Romam venio, jejuno Sabbato; cum hic sum, non jejuno. Sic enim tu, ad quam forte Ecclesiam veneris, ejus morem serva, si cuiquam non vis esse scandalo, nec quemquam tibi." S. Aug. Ad Inquisitiones Januar. i. Ep. liv.

Thus the action of the Holy Ghost within the Church of Christ illumines the minds of the different nations without destroying their national characteristics, and therefore we cannot be surprised to find many marked peculiarities in the services and ceremonies of the different Churches throughout the world. Forms of devotion and edifying rites will be ever profoundly modified by climate, by the history of thought, and by the degree of civilisation that may have been attained. Absolute uniformity of ritual and worship is not desirable. It may be gained, but it will be at the expense of customs, to which tradition imparts a peculiar value, and of that sense of largeness and freedom, which is so important an element, and so conducive to the health and proper action of the Body of Christ<sup>3</sup>.

vi. The Second Clause of the Article contains a caution against those persons, who, of their private judgment, wantonly break or neglect the customs of the Church. For by such infringement (i) they "offend against the common order of the Church;" (ii) they "hurt the authority of the magistrate<sup>4</sup>;" (iii) they "wound the consciences of the weak<sup>5</sup> brethren."

the Faith. The Faith is one everywhere, and at all times. What the Article claims is only that "every particular or National Church<sup>1</sup> hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites ordained only by man's authority." Even under the Empire National Churches, like those of Africa, Spain, and Gaul, used each their own code, and were marked by variations of practice in things non-essential<sup>2</sup>. And if this was so, much more is variation permissible in reference to inferior matters, such as discipline, ceremonies, and whatsoever tends to the edification of each local Church. This principle was fully admitted by Gregory the Greats, when he bade S. Augustine of Canterbury carefully select whatever he found in the Church of Rome, or Gaul, or in any Church whatever that was likely to please Almighty God, and introduce it into the Church of England, then new in the Faith. remembering that we must love not things for places, but places for things4. # ARTICLES XXXV.—XXXIX.

The Articles in this group deal with certain points affecting the Church and the Realm of England.

- (a) They treat of the two Books of Homilies put forth in the Sixteenth Century (Art. XXXV.), and defend the Anglican Ordinal as containing all things really necessary to valid Ordination (Art. XXXVI.);
- (β) They define the limits of the Royal Supremacy, and assert its right to be free from all foreign jurisdiction (Art. XXXVII.);
- (γ) Lastly they touch on certain points put forward by the Anabaptists respecting capital punishment and the lawfulness of war (Art. XXXVII.), community of goods (Art. XXXVIII.), and the right of a Christian man to take an oath in a Court of Justice (Art. XXXIX.).

- i. The Title of this Article was originally Homiliæ, "Homilies," and in 1571, De Homiliis, "Of Homilies." In 1563 the statement about the Homilies, without the Title, was appended to the preceding Article on Ecclesiastical Traditions. The Catalogus Homiliarum, so entitled, constituted the next Article, Art. XXXIV. of that year. In 1571 the Title De Homiliis and the text subjoined were introduced as an independent Article by Archbishop Parker.
- ii. The Word Homily¹ denotes (1) a familiar or colloquial discourse², (2) an inartificial, popular address delivered to a congregation³. From the beginning of the Church's activity the preaching of Sermons and Homilies formed a very important department of its teaching office, and mainly took the form of comments on the Divine Scriptures, and expositions of large consecutive passages. These expositions and instructions⁴ lived on during the

1 The substantive 'Oμλla occurs in I Cor. xv. 33, φθείρουσων ήθη χρήσθ' όμιλίαι κακαί. Here the word is used in the sense of "evil company," "Evil company doth corrupt good manners." The verb from which it is formed occurs more frequently in the New Testament. Thus in S. Luke xxiv. 14 we are told of the two journeying to Emmaus that they communed (ώμιλουν) with each other of all those things which had happened; and in Acts xx. 11 we find S. Paul at Troas talking to those assembled (ὁμιλησαs) a long while, even till break of day; and it is said on another occasion that Felix communed with Paul (ώμιλει) Acts xxiv. 25.

The word did not pass into common use in this sense in Latin before the fifth century. Victor Vitensis towards the end of that century speaks of Augustine's popular addresses, "quos Græci homilias vocant," as if 'homilia' were still somewhat strange to his Latin readers. Smith's Dict. Christian Antiqq. i. 781.

4 The most primitive types of Homilies are perhaps the discourses which accompanied the celebration of the Holy Eucharist (Acts xx. 7 sqq). To these Justin Martyr refers as follows: είτα παυσαμένου τοῦ ἀναγινώσκοντος ὁ προεστώς διὰ λόγου τὴν νουθεσίαν καὶ πρόκλησιν της των καλων τούτων μιμήσεως ποιείται. Apol. i. 67. Another instance is the instruction, which was delivered to the Catechumens at the Traditio Symboli, and of this S. Augustine's Sermo ad Catechumenos is a specimen. This instruction in subsequent times assumed a fixed form, and was termed in the Latin Church Præfatio Symboli. Exhortations from the Holy Scriptures form a great part of the writings of S. Cyril of Jerusalem, S. Chrysostom, S. Gregory of Nyssa, S. Gregory Nazianzen, and S. Basil in the East, of S. Ambrose, S. Augustine, Middle Ages<sup>1</sup>, and the habit of preaching varied with the fervour or languor of the Church. In the East it gradually died out, and at present hardly forms any part of the public worship of the Church. In the West it never entirely ceased even in the worst of times. Preaching at the time of the Reformation had greatly deteriorated. The practice had almost been abandoned by the parochial Clergy and left to the Friars. The Reformers, before the actual breach with Rome, had already begun to use this weapon for their own purposes, and when the breach had taken place, they saw plainly its great importance2.

iii. The First Book of Homilies was the first book pertaining to the teaching of the Church of England which was put forth in the reign of Edward VI. Of the Twelve Homilies which it contained three at least, including that Of the Salvation of all Mankind, Of the true and lively Faith, and the Exhortation to the reading and knowledge of the Holy Scripture, appear to have been written by Cranmer himself, while those Of the Misery of all Mankind and Of Christian Love and Charity were the work of Bishop Bonner and his Chaplain<sup>3</sup>. Nine editions of this book were printed before the end of 1547, but they were and S. Leo in the West. Bede's Homiliæ de Tempore were much used by those who were unable or unwilling to compose sermons. Charles the Great commissioned Paul Warnefrid to draw up a collection of Homilies from the Fathers. In A.D. 813 the Council of Rheims enjoined the Bishops to preach Sermons of the Fathers in the dialect of their several dioceses. The Collection of Ælfric was probably the successor of various other collections of English Homilies, some of which may have existed before the time of Charles the Great. See Smith's Dict. Christian Antiqq. ii. p. 782.

preaching of S. Bernard, of eminent friars belonging to the Dominican Order, of Savonarola, of S. Anthony of Padua exerted a great effect. For the names of authors of mediæval Sermons which were deemed most worthy of preservation after the invention of printing, see Bp Forbes On the Articles,

received with scant favour. If the Priest misliked both them and the "Men of the New Learning," from whom they emanated, he read them unintelligibly. If the people objected to them, there was such talking and babbling in church, that not a word could be heard.

- iv. The Second Book of Homilies. It was intended during the reign of Edward VIth to put out a fresh Book of Homilies, but this was prevented by his death and the accession of Queen Mary<sup>2</sup>. When Elizabeth came to the throne, a second Book of Homilies was drawn up, and together with the Thirty-Nine Articles was submitted to Convocation in 1562. The queen took some time to consider them and they were not in the hands of the public till Aug. 1, 1563. These new Homilies, twenty in number, were, it is supposed, to a great extent the work of Bishop Jewel. But their authorship has not in every case been ascertained, and a considerable portion of the material, out of which the book was framed, is traceable to foreign sources3.
- v. Their Reception. At first, as we have seen, it was necessary to enjoin the Clergy to read the Homilies distinctly, on account of the general dislike of the innovations they contained. In the course of time, however, the tone of feeling changed, and the Puritans were the chief

3 Hardwick's History of the Reformation, p. 249, n. 4. Of Homily x., on "Certain Passages in Scripture," a few sentences were taken from a tract of Erasmus; Homily xi. "Of Almsdeeds" is greatly drawn from

S. Cyprian; Hom. xviii. "Of Matrimony, is derived half from Veit Die-tricke of Nuremberg, and half from S. Chrysostom; Hom. xix. "Of Repentance," is translated to a great extent from Rudolph Gualther. The xxist "Against Rebellion" was added on the occasion of the rising in the North of England instigated with a view of restoring the Roman obedience by the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland.

party who disliked them1, on the ground that nothing uninspired ought to be read in church. The Homilies were now enjoined to be read by way of stifling "the prophesyings2," and for this reason were appealed to by James I., who directed their use3. There is little danger in these days of the Homilies being esteemed by the people as of like authority with Holy Scripture, and the objection to them on this ground would equally apply to the use of Sermons and Hymns as part of public worship.

vi. Their Authority. The measure of the authority of the Homilies has been diversely estimated. While some would hardly attach to them any real value, others would elevate them almost to the position of a standard of doctrine. Their value is sufficiently expressed in the words of the Article itself, when it says that they "contain a godly and wholesome doctrine," and necessary for the times in which they were drawn up. We are not required to express approval of every statement which occurs in them. The assent we are called upon to give to them is general,

1 Hardwick On the Articles, p. 205; History of the Reformation, p. 232. Many of the exiles during the reign of Mary, unaccustomed for some years to such services as those of the English Church, no sooner returned than they lost no time in expressing their dis-like of them. "Remove Homylies, Articles, Injunctions" was soon the

2 The "Method of Prophesying," especially rife in East Anglia, under the patronage of Parkhurst, Bishop of Norwich, was rigorously suppressed by Archbishop Parker in 1574. About two years later Archbishop Grindal though opposed by the queen, who held that the remedy would be found in great measure in the use of the Homilies, attempted to regulate "the Prophesyings." - i. The present Title of the XXXVIth Article varies considerably from that in the original draft. In 1553 it ran, "Of the booke of Praiers, and Ceremonies of the Churche of Englande<sup>1</sup>." Thus it covered the whole Prayer-Book. But in 1563 the part of the Article relating to the Prayer-Book itself was omitted<sup>2</sup>, and it was restricted to the Ordinal or the "Consecration of Bishops and Ministers."
- ii. The Ordinal. On Jan. 31, 1550, six prelates and six other men of the realm, "learned in God's law," were appointed to prepare an Ordinal as a companion to the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI.<sup>1</sup>, and this with a few changes was added to the revised Prayer-Book of 1552. The Ordinal, thus drawn up, was again revised by Convocation in 1661<sup>2</sup>, and has ever since been retained in the Church of England.

iii. Object. It was to confirm the authority of this Ordinal that the present Article was inserted by the Convocation of 1562 in place of the old XXXVth Article, which covered the whole Prayer-Book. The intention of those who drew it up was to confute the views of two opposite parties:— $(\alpha)$  the Mediævalists, who objected to the Ordinal on the ground that it lacked some, as they supposed, essential ceremonies;  $(\beta)$  the extreme Reformers, who took grave exception to it as containing some superstitious forms and phrases.

iv. Analysis. As against the first class of objectors the Article asserts that

- (α) The Ordinal set forth in the reign of Edward VI. contains all things necessary to both "Consecration and Ordering";
- (β) As against the second it affirms that it contains nothing "that of itself is superstitious and ungodly";
- (γ) It concludes by stating clearly and explicitly that "all such are rightly, orderly, and lawfully consecrated and ordered," who either have been or hereafter shall be consecrated or ordered according to the Rites of this Book<sup>3</sup>.

v. The First Objection to the validity of our Orders on the part of Roman divines is founded on an alleged flaw in their derivation. They are derived through Matthew Parker<sup>1</sup>, who was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury on Sunday, December 17, 1559. He was consecrated according to the Ordinal of the Church of England in the chapel of Lambeth Palace by William Barlow, who was Bishop of Bath and Wells before Mary's accession, and was then Bishop-elect of Chichester; by John Scory, formerly Bishop of Chichester, then Bishop-elect of Hereford: by Miles Coverdale, formerly Bishop of Exeter2; and by John Hodgkyns<sup>3</sup>, Bishop suffragan of Bedford. A story, invented some fifty years later, endeavoured to throw discredit on Parker's consecration by representing that it took place in a tavern in a ludicrous manner4. But no historical fact is more certain than the due and orderly performance of the its ritual deformities, the Prayer-Book was "full of corruptions," that in the Ordinal there was one paragraph, which they never hesitated to condemn as "manifest blasphemy," and some, for this reason, steadily refused to sign the Articles in 1571, when called into the presence of the High Commissioners." Hardwick, Hist. Art., p. 206.

Hodgkyns was consecrated on Dec. 9, 1537, according to the Sarum Pontifical by Stokesley, Bishop of London, Hilsey, Bishop of Rochester, and Wharton, Bishop of S. Asaph.
The "Nag's Head" fable was

Estcourt allows that "it is very unfortunate it was ever seriously put forward; for it is so absurd on the face of it that it has led to the suspicion of Catholic theologians not being sincere in the objections they make to Anglican orders." Estcourt, Question of Anglican Ordinations discussed, p. 154. "When the fiction was put forward the aged Earl of Nottingham, who (then being 23 years of age) had been, as a connection of Parker's, present at the actual consecration in Lambeth Chapel, when the story was told at the Privy Council, declared it to be false, and referred in confirmation of this statement to the account which had been drawn up at the time and given by the Archbishop to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. The king thereupon sent for it, and it was found to corroborate the earl's statement. The chaplain to the earl's son also declared that his father had often heard from the old earl the same account of the consecration." Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. v. p. 553.

ceremony in the chapel of Lambeth Palace. Then it is objected that the evidence is insufficient to show that Bishop Barlow, who acted as the head of the Commission for consecrating Parker, was himself consecrated. This. however, would not amount to an insuperable defect, even if it were true, for all the Bishops laid their hands on Parker, and all repeated the words1, and thus each performed the complete act of consecration. But, in point of fact, there is no valid ground for doubting the fact of Barlow's consecration. It is true that the record of it is absent from the Lambeth register. But this register was carelessly kept, and is acknowledged to be incomplete2. It lacks the record of the consecration of Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, and Stokesley, Bishop of London, who were consecrated in the reign of Henry VIII., and of some six or seven prelates, who are known to have been consecrated during Cranmer's primacy. The omission, therefore, of Barlow's name from the record may be regretted, but it is no valid proof against his consecration, and when it is considered that Parker was elected by the Chapter of Canterbury, and confirmed without opposition at Bow Church3: that he was consecrated by four bishops, all of whom laid their hands upon him; that no official or formal protest was made at the time against his consecration; that no rival claimant to the See was put forward4; and that for

Thus in Pole's Register there are two omissions, Goldwell, S. Asaph, 1554, and Pate, Worcester, 1555, while in that kept by Archbishop Warham, there are several lacunes. Thus, whereas during his archiepiscopate there were 25 bishops consecrated, the records of 20 of these consecrations only are given, while 5 are missing, viz. Blyth of Lichfield and Coventry, 1503; Penry of Bangor, 1504; Stanley of Ely, 1506; Stokesley of London, 1530; Gardiner of Winchester, 1531. Haddan, Preface to Bramhall, iii. p. 17; Hierarchia Anglicana, p. 30, n.

eleven years the Roman Catholics in England did not formally withdraw from the jurisdiction of the Anglican Episcopate, it is difficult to see how any really valid objection can be made to the claim of Parker1 to have been rightly and duly consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury<sup>2</sup>.

vi. The Second Objection is to the form and matter of Anglican Ordinations as lacking certain essential ceremonies. The essence, we are told, of valid Ordination, the necessary form and matter, includes at the consecration of a Bishop the delivery to him of the pastoral staff and ring, and at the Ordination of a Priest, the handing to him of the chalice and paten with the words, "Receive the power to offer sacrifice." This omission, it is urged, vitiates the Anglican Ordinal. But it may be replied without fear of contradiction that the delivery of the pastoral staff and ring to a Bishop cannot be traced back further than the eighth century, and the porrection, as it is called, to the Priest of the sacred vessels3 was unknown to the

and was admitted to the temporalities of his See on March 21 by Royal letters after homage had been made to the queen in the usual manner. See Patents, 2 Eliz. p. 14; Strype, Parker, Bk. ii. ch. i.

1 The Diary of Archbishop Parker, preserved in the Library of Corpus Christi College contains the following entry:—"17. Decembr. Anno 1559. Consecratus sum in Archiepiscopum Cantuar. Heu! Heu! Domine in quæ tempora servasti me? Jam veni in profundum aquarum et tempestas demersit me. O Domine vim patior, responde pro me et Spiritu Tuo principali confirma me." Strype, Parker, Appendix, p. 15, gives extracts from

2 "When," writes Dr Lingard, "we find Barlow during ten years, the remainder of Henry's reign, constantly associated, as a brother, with the other consecrated Bishops, discharging with them all the duties, both spiritual and secular, of a consecrated Bishop, summoned equally with them to Parliament and Convocation, taking his seat among them, according to seniority, and voting on all subjects as one of them; it seems most unreasonable to suppose, without direct proof, that he had never received that sacred rite, without which, according to the laws of both Church and State, he could not have become a member of the episcopal body." See Lingard. Appendix; Dalbus, Les Ordinations Anglicanes, p. 18. "The result of my investigation," says Dr Döllinger, "is that I have no manner of doubt as to the validity of the Episcopal succession in the English Church."

Bonn Conference 1874, p. 51.

<sup>3</sup> The delivery of the patena cum oblatis and the calix cum vino followed the chrism, or the anointing of the Western Church for a thousand years. Its use in the Eastern Church is merely accessory. If, therefore, these ceremonies belong to "the essential matter and form of orders," all the Ordinations of the first thousand years and all those of the Eastern Church also are vitiated. The argument, therefore, from omission proves too much, and it is certain that the further back we go, the simpler do we find all the forms of ordination in all parts of the world, while the true essentials of ordination in Apostolic times were (I) imposition of hands and (2) prayer.

vii. A Third Objection is that, if the laying on of hands is sufficient matter, the words "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," without specification of the office of Bishop or Priest, do not constitute a form sufficiently explicit to show the intention of the act in each case. But neither Scripture nor the Church has prescribed any indispensable form of words to be used on such occasions, and the introduction of the phrase "for the Office and Work of a Bishop," into hands of the priest. The chrism, however, was not in general use till the 9th century, and there is no mention of the porrection of the sacred vessels in the oldest Ordinals. See Smith's Dict. Christian Antiquities, ii. p. 515; Gore, The Church and the Ministry, p. 68, note. The delivery of the chalice and paten and pastoral staff was retained in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., but laid aside in that of 1552.

i. 6. Even Bellarmine allows that the imposition of hands is the essential part of Ordination, and he cites the decree of the Council of Trent, Sessiv., c. 3, concerning Extreme Unction, where it says that the minister of extreme unction is a Bishop or Priest duly ordained per manus impositionem.

De Hierarchia Anglicana, p. 64.

<sup>3</sup> See Palmer, Orig. Lit. ii. p. 304; Collier, Eccl. Hist. v. pp. 366 sq. As He ascended, our Lord lifted up His hands and blessed His Apostles (Luke xxiv. 50), and this significant action was adopted afterwards by them at Ordinations. Thus Paul and Barnabas were ordained with prayer and laying on of hands (Acts xiii. 3); thus Timothy was consecrated (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6); thus the Bishops, ordained by the Apostles (Acts xx. 28); thus Deacons were ordained (Acts vi. 3), and Priests (1 Tim. v. 22).

the Form for the consecration of Bishops, and of the phrase "for the Office and Work of a Priest" into that for the ordering of Priests, which was made in 1661, removes any objection, at all events, to our present Ordinal. Moreover the intention of the imposition of hands is not shewn merely by the words which at the moment accompany the act itself. It is expressed both by the title and by the character of the Ordinal. Furthermore it is to be noticed that the Bishops, consecrated according to the Ordinal as it was in the reign of Elizabeth, were in no worse case than were their predecessors. In none of the English Pontificals. except that of Exeter, is there any determining word at the time of the imposition of hands, and the occurrence in the English Ordinal of the charge of S. Paul to Timothy as Bishop (I Tim. iii. 1-6), shews that it has always been the intention, from the consecration of Parker onwards, to confer the Episcopate.

viii. A Fourth Objection has been urged to the effect that the form of Ordination to the Priesthood is not valid without some reference to the power of offering sacrifice, and that in this respect the English Ordinal is defective. But the sacrificial function of the Priesthood has received in the later Rites an emphasis which it would be difficult to prove to be essential. S. Paul writes, Christ gave some to be Apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering, unto the building up of the body of Christ, until we all attain..... unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ<sup>2</sup> (Eph. iv. II—I3). The Apostle does not mention the offering of sacrifice expressly; it is only implied. The reference to it is by no means prominent or even invariable in the earliest Rites. In the important collections of Morinus, Martene and Muratori, there are no early Latin Rites which contain it, and in the early Greek Rites which do contain it, it is associated more noticeably with the Episcopate than with the Priesthood<sup>1</sup>. There is no mention of it in the Ethiopic Ordination Rites, in the ancient Coptic Rites of Ordination, in the Rite of the Syrian Jacobites, or in several of the most ancient Latin Sacramentaries a thousand years old?. The functions of the Priesthood are expressed in the Apostolic Constitutions<sup>3</sup> in very general terms. Morinus himself allows that there is no express mention of this power in the most ancient formularies4. The omission in the English Ordinal5 is certainly not due to any depreciation of the sacrificial function of the Priesthood, if we may interpret this Rite by the Order of Holy Communion, the structure and language of which presuppose the principle of sacrifice in the ancient and Catholic sense6

'" Les erreurs de l'Église Anglicane, surtout celles qui ont pour objet le sacerdoce et le sacrifice eucharistique, n'ont-elles pas déteint sur la rédaction de l'Ordinal au point d'en compromettre l'efficacité? Il me semble que, sur ce point, la présomption est en faveur de la thèse anglicane. Il n'y a pas d'hérésies positivement énoncees dans l'Ordinal; tout ce qu'on peut reprocher à ses auteurs est d'en avoir écarté toutes les expressions qui supposent un véritable sacerdoce sacrificateur et un véritable sacrifice eucharistique. Mais c'est là chose plutôt négative; l'Ordinal n'en devient pas positivement hérétique." Review of "De Hierarchia Anglicana" in La Correspondance Catholique, 23 Mai,

6 As regards the doctrine of Intention, see above pp. 313, 314. Barlow was required to consecrate Parker, and he did so, and we cannot but believe that he really intended to do and to say what he actually did and said in the matter of consecration. The fact that each one of the Bishops present pronounced the consecrating words shews that the whole subject had been cautiously and seriously con-

ix. The Objections of the Puritans were of a very different kind. The Puritans were opposed to the use of the words in the Ordination of Priests, "Receive the Holy Ghost...Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained." They alleged that the power of remitting and retaining sins was miraculous, confined to the Apostles, and not to be expected in other Ministers, and further that as man cannot bestow the Spirit of God, it is profane to claim the power to do so. Now the formula "Receive ye the Holy Ghost" is grounded on the words of our Lord to His Apostles on the evening of the world's first Easter-Day, when He said to them, As the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you1, and when He breathed on them2 and said Receive ye the Holy Ghost3 (John xx. 21, 22). The words in the original indicate that the gift spoken of was not the personal sanctifying Grace of God in their hearts, nor the miraculous baptism of the Spirit, afterwards bestowed on the day of Pentecost<sup>4</sup>, but it was the Grace of Ordination, the right to exercise that Ministry of Reconciliation, which He had rendered effectual by His Resurrection from the dead5.

<sup>2</sup> Ἐνεφύσησε. "The breath (πνεῦμα) is an emblem of the Spirit (John iii. 8); and by 'breathing,' as S. Augustine observes, the Lord shewed that the Spirit was not the Spirit of the Father only but also His own. The act is described as one  $(i\nu\epsilon\phi\psi\sigma\eta\sigma\epsilon)$ , and not repeated. The gift was once for all, not to individuals but to the abiding body." Bp Westcott in loc.

3 The words in the original Greek are λάβετε πνεθμα ἄγιον. Here it is to be noticed that the definite article is altogether wanting. The words, therefore, might be translated Receive ve Holy Spirit, which would imply not the Holy Spirit in His fulness,

but "a gift of the Holy Spirit."

4 "The Spirit which the Lord now imparted to them was His Spirit, or, as it may be expressed, the Holy Spirit as dwelling in Him. By this He first quickened them, and then sent, according to His promise, the Paraclete to be with them, and to supply all power for the exercise of their different functions. The relation of the Paschal to the Pentecostal gift is therefore the relation of quickening to endowing. The one answers to the power of the Resurrection, and the other to the power of the Ascension (Godet); the one to victory and the other to Sovereignty." Bp Westcott

Ministry, the power to minister, is one of the gifts of the Spirit (Rom. xii. 7). This, including all that it involves, our Lord bestowed upon the Apostles, and, as we have seen<sup>1</sup>, upon all who should come after them. Hence, when the hand of the Bishop is laid upon the head of him whom he ordains, we need not doubt that the charisma of God's Spirit is given for the Office and Work of a Priest in the Church of God.

x. Absolution. God can forgive only the sins of those who truly repent and unfeignedly believe, for these conditions of pardon are inexorably laid down by God Himself. But God is pleased to work through men upon the world of men, and He uses a human Ministry to declare and convey His forgiveness to those, who fulfil the prescribed conditions of that forgiveness, just as He uses the instrumentality of men to preach the word, to teach, to edify, and to comfort. Hence every Bishop, who has authority to ordain, has also authority to declare that "the Ministry of Reconciliation" is committed to the person whom he ordains, and the newlyordained Priest receives by Christ's own ordinance a divine commission to minister, and at the same time a divine commission duly to exercise the power of pronouncing the absolution of sins on the prescribed conditions of faith and repentance being observed by the recipient<sup>2</sup>.

- i. Title and Language. The Title of Article xxxvii. has remained uniform since the original draft in 1553, but the language has undergone considerable modification. As it was first drawn up it began, "The King of England is supreme head in earth, next under Christ, of the Church of England and Ireland<sup>1</sup>." This language is nearly identical with that of the Act of Supremacy passed in 1534 in the reign of Henry VIII., in which Henry is acknowledged as "Protector and only Supreme Head of the Church and Clergy of England," but with the important proviso, "so far as is permitted by the Law of Christ<sup>2</sup>."
- ii. Alteration under Elizabeth. On the accession of Mary the Acts of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. were repealed. When Elizabeth came to the throne, her first act was to restore to the Crown "the ancient jurisdiction over the State ecclesiastical and spiritual, abolishing all foreign power repugnant to the same." The title, however, "Supreme Head of the Church," was never revived, and for it was substituted that of "Supreme Governor of the Church." In an Admonition appended to her injunctions of A.D. 1559 the Queen explained that nothing was meant by this, other than what was acknowledged to be due to "the most noble kings of famous memory," her father and brother<sup>3</sup>, and which was of ancient time claimed by the

1 "Rex Angliæ est supremum caput in terris, post Christum, Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ et Hibernicæ." To this one MS. added, "Neque in universo orbe ullum seipso majorem agnoscit a quo sua potestas et autoritas pendeat." Hardwick, Hist. Art., p. 342,

"It is plain from the recitals in that and also in another Statute of the same year, and from other proofs, that the King did not mean to claim any spiritual office or character, or any power different in its nature from what had often before been asserted as belonging of right to the English Crown." Earl of Selborne, Defence of the Church of England, p. 32. "The legislation of Henry VIII.th's

The legislation of Hemy VIII. th's reign against the Pope's pretensions to jurisdiction in this kingdom did but carry to their full consequences, under the circumstances of that time, principles admitted in Anglo-Saxon times, for which Norman and Plantagenet kings had contended, which had been embodied in the acts of their Councils and Parliaments, and in which the imperial crown of this realm,—"that is, under God, to have the sovereignty and rule over all manner of persons born within these her realms, dominions, and countries, of what state, either ecclesiastical or temporal, soever they be, so as no other foreign power shall or ought to have any superiority over them<sup>1</sup>."

iii. Analysis. The present Article, therefore, (i) commences with the assertion that "The Queen's Majesty hath the chief power in this realm of England and other her dominions," and then (ii) goes on to state that to the Sovereign appertains the chief government of all estates of the Realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, and that she is not, nor ought to be, subject to any foreign jurisdiction. (iii) Moreover to silence objections, it defines the limits of the government of the sovereign as not extending either (a) to the performance of any spiritual function, or (b) to the exercise of any prerogative other than that allowed to godly princes in Holy Scripture by God Himself2. (iv) It declares that the government of the sovereign extends to that coercive power, which alike in the Old and the New Testaments is placed in the hands of princes3. (v) This done, the Article proceeds to lay down the following points:

Ecclesiastical authorities of the realm had either actively concurred or at least practically acquiesced." Earl Selborne, Defence of the Church of England, pp. 8, 9.

the civil magistrate is not the source of spiritual as well as civil jurisdiction, and the Church of England "claims to have a spiritual mission and authority, a ministry of the Word and Sacraments, neither derived from nor communicable to the State; and she acknowledges in the Head of the State that power only, over ecclesiastical persons and causes, which she believes to be within the rightful province of all Christian Governments." Earl Selborne, Defence of the Church of England, p. 35.

- That "the Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction  $(\alpha)$ in this realm":
- That the Anabaptist anarchism which impugns the right of the national sovereign either to (1) inflict capital punishment, or to (2) claim the services of his subjects in war, is reprehensible.

iv. The Civil Supremacy in temporal matters is the foundation of all settled government, and Scripture alike in the Old and the New Testament sanctions the extension of this power, under due and proper limits, to matters ecclesiastical. Thus (a) In the Old Testament under a government which was throughout ideally theocratic, the representative of Jehovah, whether lawgiver, judge or king, had a certain authority in affairs of religion, in spite of the existence of a powerful and exclusive hereditary priesthood. Of this we have instances in the relations of Saul to the tribe of Levi (I Sam. xv. 17), and of David and of Solomon to the conduct of public worship (I Chron. xxiii. 61; 2 Chron. viii. 152). Again (β) in the New Testament:-(1) Our Lord directs that all alike are to render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's (Luke xx. 25); (2) S. Paul bids every soul be subject to the higher powers as being ordained of God (Rom. xiii. 1); (3) S. Peter writes to the Christians of the Dispersion, Be subject unto every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether it be unto the king, as supreme; or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by Him for vengeance on evil doers, and for praise to them that do well (I Pet. ii. 13, 14).

v. The Royal Supremacy. These passages guide

2 But the king was not allowed to intrude upon the sacred offices of religion, as was shewn by the punishment of Saul (1 Sam. xiii. 8—14), and the punishment of Uzziah for intruding into the Holy Place to burn incense (2 Chron. xxvi. 16 ff.).

us to a right conception of what is meant by the royal supremacy. (i) We do not mean, (a) a spiritual headship, for that belongs to Christ alone; nor (b) an ecclesiastical headship, such as would empower the sovereign to teach or preach, or administer the Sacraments, or consecrate persons and things, or impose ecclesiastical censures1: nor (c) an arbitrary and unlimited supremacy, so that we should be supposed to put our consciences under the uncontrolled guidance of the sovereign. (ii) What we do mean is (a) that the sovereign cannot, in his relation to the Church, divest himself of his proper prerogative; (b) that for coercive purposes and to preserve the peace of the realm he is over all persons and in all causes supreme; (c) that legally and constitutionally he can do nothing concerning the doctrine and discipline of the Church, unless it has received the consent of the clergy and laity, as represented in Convocation and Parliament respectively; (d) that he is entitled to those ancient privileges, which belonged to kings and princes in Scripture, to Christian Emperors in primitive times, and to the ancient sovereigns of England, and which empower them to "rule all estates and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil doers."

vi. The Papal Jurisdiction in the realm of England is claimed on various grounds. It is urged that (i) S. Peter had a supremacy given him over the rest of the Apostles, and over the universal Church; that (ii) he exercised this supremacy as Bishop of Rome for upwards of twenty-five years; that (iii) this supremacy is inherited by the mally acknowledged the king's 'Supreme Headship' of the Church of England." Earl of Selborne, Defence of the Church of England, p. 32.

Bishops of Rome as his successors; that (iv) England was converted to the Christian Faith by Missionaries from Rome and therefore owes allegiance to the Roman See.

vii. The Supremacy of S. Peter. We do not deny that a certain primacy was conceded to S. Peter by our Lord. We cannot read the New Testament without noticing that (1) his name is placed first in all the catalogues of the Apostles<sup>1</sup>; that (2) he takes the lead in speaking and acting for the rest<sup>2</sup>; that (3) he is peculiarly honoured in conjunction with S. James and S. John<sup>3</sup>; that (4) our Lord makes to him a special promise as regards His Church<sup>4</sup>; that (5) after the Ascension he is οικοδομήσω μου την εκκλησίαν but έπί ταύτη τη πέτρα. The expression points, not so much to the person of the Apostle himself, as to something to which his name (Πέτρος) bore witness, and which had evinced itself in his glorious confession. This much at any rate seems clear;—(a) The Apostle obviously could not be the Rock in any sense which trenched on the prerogative of Christ Himself, Who is the foundation stone, θεμέλιος (I Cor. iii. II), the chief corner stone, άκρογωνιαίος (Eph. ii. 20), binding the parts of the building of His Church together; (β) still S. Peter by virtue of his faith and confession had a primacy, not the primacy of absolute sovereignty, but "the primacy of historical inauguration," as Bp Lightfoot terms it:  $(\gamma)$  and so in the Apostolic records he appears using the keys and opening the gates at each successive stage in the progress of the Church. The same courageous faith, which prompted this confession and called forth the promise of Christ, enables him to receive into the Church the three thousand on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 41); to open the gates to the Samaritans (Acts viii. 14, 16); to admit the Gentile Cornelius to Christian Baptism (Acts x. 46, 47).

ix. 2; Luke ix. 28.

4 "And I say unto thee (κάγὼ δέ σοι λέγω) that thou art Peter (ὅτι σὺ εῖ Πέτρος), and upon this rock (ἐπὶ ταύτη τῆ πέτρα) I will build My Church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it, and I will give thee (δώσω σοι) the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 18, 19). Amongst the Fathers there is no fixity of interpretation as regards the meaning here of the Rock. Different interpretations are given by many in different parts of their works. Some apply it to S. Peter himself; others to the faith he confessed; others to Christ, acknowledged by the Apostle to be God and Man. S. Augustine himself varies in his interpretation. In his earlier expositions he acknowledges he had applied the words to S. Peter, but in his later ones to Christ (S. Aug. Retract. i. 21). It is noticeable that our Lord does not say ἐπί σοι signally prominent in the founding of the Church. But primacy of order does not involve preeminence of jurisdiction. Had it been so, we surely should have found in the New Testament some traces of such preeminence being asserted and claimed. But so far from it,

(a) In the Gospels,

- (i) We never find our Lord giving S. Peter himself apart from the rest of the Apostles any title of special honour;
- (ii) On the contrary we find Him protesting against any claims to preeminence, and saying, Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant (Matt. xx. 27); Be not ye called Rabbi, for one is your teacher, and all ye are brethren (Matt. xxiii. 8);
- (iii) Again in the solemn delegation of ministerial authority after His resurrection, He says to the whole Apostolic body in general, As the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you (ὑμᾶς, John xx. 21)¹.

But then, as though to shew that the Church was not founded on the personality of S. Peter, he vanishes from our sight, and another assumes the chief place in his stead, of whom, not of S. Peter, S. Augustine says "Ipse (Paulus) caput et princeps Apostolorum" and again "(Paulus) tanti Apostolatus meruit principatum." See S. Aug. De Pecc. Meritis et Remissione ii. 20; Bp Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, Pt. i. Vol. ii., pp. 487 sqq.

1 Again He says Whose soever sins

Again He says Whose soever sins YE forgive, they are forgiven unto them, whose soever sins YE retain, they are retained (John xx. 23); Go YE, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them...teaching them (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). There is nothing here to indicate that what the Apostles had, they had not directly from Christ, but indirectly from Christ through Peter. See Gore, Rom. Cath. Claims, p. 74. "Our Lord's words were addressed to all the Apostles; no distinction was made; all were alike addressed, and all were therefore given the same Apostolical authority... Every Apostle was sent as Jesus Christ was sent by the Father; that is with the plenitude of supreme power; every Apostle was authorized to remit sins, and to teach all nations. Nothing conceivable by human imagination can surpass the grandeur and the magnitude of this Mission and these powers." Palmer, Treatise on the Church, ii. p. 480.

(B) In the Acts.

- We find S. Peter actually sent with S. John by the other Apostles to Samaria (Acts viii. 14-16);
- The appeal made at the Council of Jerusalem (ii) is not made to S. Peter, but to the Apostles and elders (Acts xv. 13, 19)1;
- The rest of the narrative throws no light upon (iii) the further history of S. Peter.

(y) In the Epistles,

- (i) S. Paul, in legitimate assertion of his own Apostolate, remarks that it was only after some interval from his conversion that he went up to Ierusalem to visit S. Peter. Although the remark itself and the terms in which it is made (ἱστορῆσαι Κηφᾶν, Gal. i. 18) point to a certain dignity peculiar to S. Peter, yet there is nothing upon which to found such claims as are advanced by Roman controversialists2.
- (ii) The same Apostle on one occasion actually withstands S. Peter to the face, because he stood condemned<sup>3</sup> (Gal. ii. 11), and he severely re-unto Peter (Gal. ii. 7). "There is no sort of dependence of S. Paul on S. Peter which these words do not exclude." Gore, Rom. Cath. Claims,

p. 80, n.

- (iii) Moreover in his own Epistles S. Peter himself never claims preeminence of jurisdiction over his fellow-Apostles or the Church. He calls himself an elder amongst elders (I Pet. v. I); an Apostle amongst other Apostles (I Pet. i. I; 2 Pet. i. I); he gives no hint that he stands in any special relation to the chief Shepherd (I Pet. v. 4) beyond that in which the other Apostles stood, any more than S. John does, when he speaks of the twelve foundations of the Church, equal and coordinate, as the twelve Apostles of the Lamb¹ (Rev. xxi. I4).

We conclude, then, from these three lines of argument that though it cannot be disputed that our Lord promised to build His Church upon S. Peter, as the great Confessor of His Divinity, there is no warrant for the notion that this gave the Apostle preeminence of jurisdiction over the others, and so over the Universal Church.

viii. S. Peter's Bishopric at Rome, which is said to have lasted upwards of twenty-five years, really involves an appeal to history, and to history we can go. The martyrdom, then, of S. Peter at Rome, which may be accepted as authentic<sup>2</sup>, cannot have taken place before A.D. 68, when Nero was Emperor. Now twenty-five years<sup>3</sup> subtracted from this date brings us to A.D. 43 as the comwith his head downwards, and that S. Paul suffered also at the same time.

mencement of the Petrine episcopate<sup>1</sup>. Perhaps we should not expect any account of the labours of S. Peter in the Pauline narrative of the Book of Acts; but, in any case, there is no reference to an episcopate of S. Peter at Rome. In A.D. 58 S. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Church of Rome<sup>2</sup>, but he preserves an absolute silence as to the episcopate there of his brother Apostle3. Between A.D. 60 and A.D. 66 he wrote at least five Epistles from Rome, but in none of these does he allude to the presence of S. Peter. In the two Epistles written by that Apostle himself he lets fall no word, which indicates any episcopal jurisdiction at Rome. The only passage which can be alleged to have any possible reference to the Eternal City is the verse, in which the Apostle writes, There saluteth you she that is in Babylon, elect together with you; and so doth Marcus my son (I Pet. v. 13)4. But, even if "Babylon" here means Rome,

1 "I cannot find," writes Bp Lightfoot, "that any writers of the first two centuries and more speak of S. Peter as bishop of Rome.....The language of Irenæus (iii. 3. 3) is explicit. He describes the Church of Rome as founded by the Apostles S. Peter and S. Paul, who appointed Linus bishop".... "After him came Linus; after Linus, Anencletus; after Anencletus in the third place from the Apostles Clement is elected to the bishopric, and the others, when any numbers are given, are numbered accordingly." Apost. Fathers, Pt i.

3 "If silence can ever be regarded as decisive, its verdict must be accepted in this case. S. Paul could not have written as he writes to the Romans (i. 11, sq., xv. 20-24) if they had received even a short visit from an Apostle, more especially if that Apostle were S. Peter." Bp Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, Pt i. Vol. ii.

Ασπάζεται ύμᾶς ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή, και Μάρκος ο υίος μου =the fellow-elect in Babylon greeteth you, and so doth Marcus my son (I Pet. v. 13). The interpreta-tions of the words are various. Some would understand them to refer to some sister or Christian lady, well known to S. Peter's converts. But the context 'Η έν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή is unnatural as the description of a person, and several early authorities (including %) add 'Εκκλησία. If a "fellow-elect Church" is intended, the mention of S. Mark, S. Peter's "companion and interpreter" (Eusebius H. E. iii. 39), points to Rome, where S. Mark composed his Gospel, and where the latest notices in the New Testament represent him either as staying or invited to visit (Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 11). Moreover the Crucifixion of S. Peter (John xxi. 18) is always connected by tradition with Rome, and with no other place. Bp Lightfoot considers there is no allusion to any jurisdiction in that City¹. While, then, it is probable that the Apostle found his way to the Capital of the West and there received the martyr's crown², the supposition that he remained for twenty-five years bishop of the Church of Rome involves insuperable chronological and historical difficulties.

ix. The Supremacy of S. Peter's successors seems to be involved in and affected by the doubts respecting the Apostle's bishopric at Rome<sup>3</sup>. If the Ultramontane view of S. Peter's privilege was recognised in early times, it is difficult to account for several historical facts. Thus

- (a) In A.D. 95 Clement of Rome writes to the Corinthians, and does not give the slightest indication of this privilege;
- (β) In A.D. 108 S. Polycarp consults Anicetus about the keeping of Easter, but he does not consider himself bound to defer to his authority as per se conclusive on the point<sup>4</sup>; this to be supported by the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians c. 5, and by that of Ignatius to the Romans c. 4. Apostolic Fathers, Pt i. Vol. ii. pp. 491, 492.

1 Irenæus says that S. Peter and S. Paul preached at Rome, and laid the foundation of the Church there, and after so doing "committed into the hands of Linus the office of the episcopate." But the Greek word here used cannot be made to mean "handed on" or "handed down," as if Linus succeeded either or both of them after they died.

Ostian Way. "The Vatican gardens were the scene of the hideous festivities, in which the victims of the fire suffered, and amongst these (we may assume) was S. Peter, A.D. 64. On the other hand an isolated victim who was put to death some years later (say A.D. 67), as was presumably S. Paul's case, might meet his death anywhere." Apostolic Fathers, Pt i. Vol. ii. pp. 497, 408.

There is not a syllable in the three texts alleged to embody the Petrine Privilege (Matt. xvi. 18, 19; Luke xxii. 31, 32; John xxi. 15—17) which empowers S. Peter to convey the privilege, whatever be its nature, to any other person, and there is no evidence producible that he ever did confer and transmit his peculiar privilege and authority.

- (γ) In A.D. 196 Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, disputes with Victor, Bishop of Rome, on the same point, and as they cannot agree, Victor excommunicates him, and for so doing, although Bishop of the capital of the West, he is rebuked by a number of bishops, and amongst them by Irenæus himself¹, "Victor stood reproved. His excommunication failed²."
- (δ) In A.D. 255 Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, and other African bishops come into collision with Pope Stephen on the question of heretical baptism, and when the latter refuses to recognise them, and renounces communion with the African Churches, they stoutly express their disapproval of his attempt to make himself a "bishop of bishops";
- (c) In A.D. 424 the bishops of Africa, with S. Augustine at their head, write strongly to Pope Celestinus, denying his right to interfere with their jurisdiction, and complaining that he had violated the Canon of the Council of Nicæa, which directed that causes between bishops and clergy shall be heard by their own metropolitan, and not carried elsewhere<sup>3</sup>;

for claiming the title of "universal bishop," and not only declares such an assumption to be arrogant, indeed, and schismatical, but affirms that he who made it was a forerunner of Anti-christ<sup>1</sup>.

Decisions of Councils speak with no less certain voice on the same subject. The sixth Canon of the Council of Nicæa, A.D. 325, places the Roman Bishop on a level with those of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. The eighth Canon of the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, forbids any bishop to invade another's province, which had not been from the beginning under his jurisdiction<sup>2</sup>. The twenty-eighth Canon of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, confirms the decrees of the Council of Constantinople, and gives in the West privileges to "Old Rome" as the seat of Empire, and to the see of "New Rome," or Constantinople, because that city was acknowledged as the seat of Empire in the East<sup>3</sup>. Evidently the Roman patriarch was considered to have no more jurisdiction given to him than the patriarchs of Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople: the first place was assigned to Rome as being the imperial City; next came Constantinople as being "New Rome"; and every bishop was expressly forbidden to invade any Diocese. which had not from the first been subject to him and to his predecessors. Of any divine right of the Roman See to than that the Bishops, who enacted this Canon, did not regard the privileges of Rome as part of the divine and essential constitution of the Church; nothing is more clear than that the primacy of Rome is a 'primacy of honour,' and that the claims of Rome to supremacy were not regarded by the Eastern Church as part of the Catholic faith.' special preeminence of jurisdiction over other Churches the Councils give no hint. Political causes chiefly led to the preeminence of the Roman Church and its bishop. All the roads in the world led to Rome; all nations were represented there; the early bishops of Rome possessed the instinct of government more strongly than their contemplative brethren of the East; and the majesty of the eternal City exercised a mysterious spell over the minds of men, as the one apostolic See of Western Europe.

xi. The Conversion of England. Another claim, however, to direct rights of jurisdiction over England is based on the fact that Pope Gregory the Great won over the country to the Christian Faith. But to this it may be well replied that there is no precedent in early Church history for such an argument. It nowhere appears that a Church, which succeeded in any Missionary effort, acquired permanent jurisdiction over the country it converted. If this was the case, Jerusalem would be the Mistress, as well as the Mother of all Churches. Again, there was an ancient and flourishing Church in England long before the arrival of S. Augustine<sup>2</sup>, and after his arrival the British succession3 continued for some time side by side with the Roman. While it is true that S. Augustine and his Mission won over Kent, and much of the south castern portion of the country, the conversion of by far the larger part was brought about by Scotch and Irish Missionaries, who received no Mission for this purpose from Rome at all. To these missionaries, indeed, the Christianising of all the north, west, and centre of England is due<sup>1</sup>, and as Rome never gave mission to these bodies of teachers, she cannot claim jurisdiction over regions which they won over to the Faith.

xii. Capital Punishment. Having thus justified the position that it is not within the right of the sovereign to make over the liberties of the people or the Church to any foreign power, the Article proceeds to assert the right of every independent Christian state, (i) to inflict capital punishment, and (ii) to engage in just and righteous wars. Capital punishment was deemed by some in the sixteenth century, as it is by not a few now, to be inconsistent with the spirit of Christ's Sermon on the Mount, wherein He forbids men to resist him that is evil<sup>2</sup>, and directs whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also (Matt. v. 39), and again says, All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword 3 (Matt. xxvi. 52). But here undoubtedly our Lord is dealing with the behaviour of indi-quest, returned with the Christian Faith." Green's History of the English People, i. p. 42.

¹ See Bright, Early English Church History, pp. 94—96; Bp Lightfoot, Leaders in the Northern Church, p. 11. "Augustine," the Bishop writes, "was the Apostle of Kent, but Aidan was the Apostle of England." We may perhaps not form the highest estimate of the success of S. Augustine's Mission, but still it effected much. "Practically his landing had renewed the union with the western world which that of Hengist had destroyed. The new England was admitted into the older commonwealth of nations. The civilisation, art, letters, which had fled before the sword of the English Con-

vidual Christians, not with states or communities or the magistrates of any country. Under the Patriarchal Dispensation we find capital punishment was enjoined. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, we read, by man shall his blood be shed (Gen. ix. 5). This commandment, applicable to the whole human race, was not repealed under the Mosaic Law, and under the New Dispensation we have S. Paul upholding the authority of the magistrate to inflict the penalty of death. He beareth not the sword in vain, he writes to the Romans, for he is the minister of God, an avenger for wrath to him that doeth evil (Rom. xiii. 4). If this was true of heathen magistrates, much more is it true of Christian authorities. Violations of justice differ in kind and degree. It is only reasonable that penalties should differ also. The extreme violation of justice is wilful murder. The corresponding extreme penalty is capital punishment, which is necessary for the protection of society.

xiii. The Right of War. As with capital punishment, so with the right of war, some of our Lord's words seem decisive against its lawfulness. But again it is to be noticed that He is dealing with individuals. The principles which He lays down may be actually applied in righteous warfare. War is a necessary evil to be entered upon for the averting of greater evils<sup>2</sup>. Wars for revenge and for mere glory are unquestionably unworthy of

of its moral consciousness of the authority of law, of duty and responsibility, of accountability and guilt." Martensen, Christian Ethics, ii. p. 176. E. T.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;The administration of justice is not only of importance to individuals whose rights are thus personally secured, but to the whole civil community. For this reason, legal institutions must be absolutely maintained against all caprice and despotism.... Its penal legislation, and the recognition and validity given thereto, is a nation's clearest expression of its consciousness of justice, and therewith

Christian states and Christian men<sup>1</sup>. But wars for the assertion of national independence, wars for the protection of people's life and liberty, are not opposed to the will of God, unless we are to believe that the Gospel was designed to condone the supremacy of the violent and unscrupulous. The testimony of Scripture seems to be clear on this point. For in the Old Testament we find the Jews<sup>2</sup> constantly engaged in war, and that often by the direct command of God3. And in the New Testament we find John the Baptist, so far from ordering the soldiers, who came to his baptism, to lay down their arms and quit their profession, bidding them do violence to no man, neither exact anything wrongfully, and be content with their wages (Luke iii. 14). Again our Lord heals the servant of the heathen centurion. and instead of ordering him to give up his calling, commends his faith as exceeding any he had found in Israel (Matt. viii. 10). S. Peter again instructs and baptizes Cornelius, but does not demand of him either before or after his baptism that he shall quit the army or give up his profession (Acts x. 34-45). Lastly S. Paul not only draws a parallel between the armour of the soldier and the panoply of the Christian, without any hint that the soldier's calling is wrong in itself (Eph. vi. 10-17), but he actually commends the prudence and self-denial of the soldier to the imitation of Timothy himself (2 Tim. ii. 4).

not overlook the fact that war has also its arousing and purifying effects. It arouses a slumbering patriotism, and calls citizens from the luxurious enjoyments of peace, and from petty and selfish interests, to sacrifices and self-denial for the common cause. It awakens in many a lively consciousness of the perishableness and insecurity of human affairs, teaches many to pray, and humbly submit to the Lord of Hosts, whose just judgments may be executed upon earth even by means of war." Martensen, Christian Ethics, ii. p. 233; 4.

The ryches and goodes of Christians are not common, as touching the ryght, title, and possession of the same, as certayne Anabaptistes do falsely boast. Notwithstandyng euery man ought of suche thinges as he possesseth, liberally to geue almes to the poore, accordyng to his habilitie.

- i. Connection. The previous Article dealt with the Anabaptist objections to capital punishment and the right of Christians to carry arms. The present Article deals with another erroneous doctrine of the same sect<sup>1</sup>, who held that the goods of Christian men were common to all alike, and pushed their peculiar doctrines so far as to leave no man anything which he could call his own<sup>2</sup>.
  - ii. Analysis. The Article asserts two things:-
    - (I) That "the riches and goods of Christian men are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same";

1 "Excludetur etiam ab eisdem Anabaptistis inducta bonorum et possessionum communitas, quam tantopere urgent, ut nemini quicquam relinquant proprium et suum." Reformatio Legum, De hæresibus, c. 14, "With them the doctrine was a source, not so much of personal self-denial, as of efforts to subvert civil government and the whole framework of society; and it was not therefore to be treated as an innocent enthusiasm, but to be denounced as a dangerous error." Bp Browne On the Articles,

p. 830.

2 "The idea of property has been challenged in modern times by such communists as St Simon, Fourier, and Proudhon, who boldly stake the matter on the apparent paradox that it is property that is the theft." Bp Forbes On the Articles, p. 791.

- (2) That nevertheless every man ought to give liberally of such things as he possesseth to the poor, according to his ability.
- iii. The Teaching of Scripture. It is true that our Lord in several passages of the Gospels dwells on the danger of riches, and exhorts His disciples to a renunciation of worldly wealth. And it is beyond doubt that in the earliest ages of the Church, the first believers had all things common (Acts ii. 44, 45), and sold their possessions and goods, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them at the Apostles' feet, and distribution was made unto each according as anyone had need (Acts ii. 45; iv. 34, 35)2. But on the other hand it is to be borne in mind that this community of goods was not even then absolute or compulsory. S. Peter says to Ananias respecting the piece of land he pretended to have sold, while it remained, did it not remain thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thy powers? (Acts v. 4). His sin lay not in the retaining of his goods, but in pretending to give all while he kept back a part. Again, Mary, the mother of John Mark, had a house at Jerusalem, and practised no little hospitality (Acts xii, 12)4.

Comp. for the state of things somewhat later Justin Mart. Apol. i. 14, 67; Didache, I. 4; Hermæ Pastor, Vis. iii. 9.

Matt. v. 42, Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away; vi. 19, Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth, where moth and rust doth consume, and where thieves break through and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven; and see the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, Luke xvi.

Si velles offerre dimidium, quis exigeret totum?" S. Aug. Sermo 148.

<sup>4</sup> There was no formal community of goods and abolition of private property in the early Jerusalem Church. There was a common purse for supporting the needy, into which many rich persons put the proceeds of the sale of their estates Acts iv. 34 sqq.), while everyone was allowed to possess his own property (Acts xii. 12). There was also a community of the daily use of all worldly possessions (Acts iv. 32), and when the Church when the Church assumed a larger scale, this community of use developed into the active charity and hospitality upon which S. Paul insists (Rom. xii. 13; xv. 26), and the existence of which is quite evident from the

- iv. A Strict Community of goods would render necessary a re-construction of the moral code, in particular of the eighth and tenth Commandments, as interpreted by our Lord and His Apostles. Thus
  - (i) Christ bids us give alms (Matt. vi. 4; x. 42); make friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness (Luke xvi. 9); call the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind to our feasts (Luke xiv. 13), feed the hungry and clothe the naked (Matt. xxv. 35);
  - (ii) Again, S. Paul bids us as we have opportunity, work that which is good (Gal. vi. 10); be given to hospitality (Rom. xii. 13); communicate to the necessity of the saints (Rom. xii. 13); lay by in store as God hath prospered us (I Cor. xvi. 2);
  - (iii) And S. Peter exhorts his converts to use hospitality one to another without murmuring (I Pet. iv. 9).
- v. The Right of Property. Now all these exhortations acknowledge the strongest obligations to abundant and liberal almsgiving. But it would be impossible to obey them, if a strict and absolute community of goods was enforced. By the very terms, in which they are expressed, they presuppose the existence of distinct possessions in the hands of members of the Church, and leave to the conscience of each man the extent to which he shall give liberally in alms to the poor and needy.

Of a Christian mans othe.

As we confesse that vayne and rashe swearing is forbidden Christian men by our lord Jesus Christe, and James his Apostle: So we iudge that Christian religion doth not prohibite, but that a man may sweare when the Magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charitie, so it be done accordyng to the prophetes teaching, in iustice, iudgement, and trueth.

- i. Connection. The Thirty-ninth Article, like the previous one, is aimed at the fanaticism of the Anabaptists, who, after the example set by the Waldenses, in more modern times followed by the Quakers, had such scruples on the subject of taking oaths, that they denied the propriety of their being exacted even in a court of justice.
- ii. Oaths. When the early Christians were called upon to swear before heathen magistrates, they were naturally required to use idolatrous oaths. This was abhorrent to them and produced a dread of swearing altogether. Still, as we learn from Tertullian, while they abhorred idolatrous oaths, they would occasionally swear by "the safety of the Emperor," though not by his genius, deeming the genii no better than demons1. Later, about A.D. 390, Vegetius informs us "that they were wont to swear by God, and Christ, and the Holy Spirit2, and the Majesty of the Emperors." There was, however, without doubt much scruple amongst the early Christians on the subject of swearing. Clement of Alexandria4 considered it an indignity for a Christian to be put upon his oath, as disparaging his fidelity, and says that he ought to avoid swearing, saying only "Yea and Nay." To this we may add the testimony of Lactantius, who says that a Christian will never perjure himself, lest he mock God; nor indeed will he swear at all, lest he fall by accident or carelessly into perjury. Still in matters of great moment it was not thought wrong to take an oath; and even S. Athanasius required of the Emperor Constantius that his accusers should be put upon their oaths?

iii. Idle and Vain Swearing. What Scripture is specially directed against is idle and vain swearing's. Such

8 The use of oaths in ordinary conversation was so common at Antioch that of the twenty-one homilies, which S. Chrysostom preached to the people of Antioch after the imperial statues had been thrown down, there is not one in which allusion is not made to this evil practice. "We shall preach to you," he says, "the whole week respecting oaths," and in one of his sermons he threatens to exclude all swearers from partaking of the Holy Mysteries. Ad Pop. Antioch, Hom. iv. 6; vi. 7.

swearing is forbidden alike by our Lord and by S. James. The Jews in our Lord's time seem to have thought they might swear as much as they chose, so long as they did not forswear themselves. But He, going deeper than the mere letter of the Commandment, bids His disciples abstain from swearing, either by heaven, or earth, or Jerusalem, or the Temple, or their heads. Let your speech, He says, be Yea, Yea; Nay, Nay (Matt. v. 33—37), and S. James (James v. 12) almost repeats in his Epistle the words of his Master, and he evidently regards rash and profane swearing in ordinary conversation as being thoroughly opposed to the Gospel of Christ.

- iv. An Oath in a Court of Justice. But while vain and rash swearing is thus forbidden, it is allowable on solemn and important occasions, and especially in a court of justice, to take an oath. For
  - (α) When Caiaphas solemnly adjured our Lord to state whether or no He was "the Son of the Blessed," He did not refuse to plead to such an adjuration, but answered at once (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64)¹;
  - (β) S. Paul frequently in very weighty matters calls God to witness, which is essentially the same thing as taking an oath. Thus he writes to the Corinthians, I protest by that glorying in you², which I have in Christ Fesus our Lord, I die daily (I Cor. xv. 31), and again, The God and Father of the Lord Fesus, He who is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not (2 Cor. xi. 31)³;

Browne On the Articles, p. 837.  $^2$  N $\dot{\eta}$   $\dot{\eta}$  $\dot$

- (y) Again, in the Epistle to the Hebrews the Almighty Himself is represented as swearing (Heb. iii. 11), and the writer of the Epistle compares this with the swearing common among men, saying, Men swear by the greater: and in every dispute of theirs the oath is final for confirmation (Heb. vi. 161).
- v. Conclusion. These examples justify on solemn and important occasions, and especially in a court of justice, the legal confirming of an assertion by a solemn attestation in the sight of God. The Article itself quotes the words of a prophet in justification of such a course. Thou shalt swear, we read in Jeremiah, the Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness (Jer. iv. 2). Three conditions are here stated to be requisite to a legitimate oath, righteousness, judgment, and truth. Righteousness, that the thing be lawful and honest, and so the Name of God be not adduced in confirmation of injustice or sin; judgment, in that the oath be not taken without necessity or grave cause; and truth, that the thing be true, or at least on reasonable grounds and bona fide believed to be true, so that the Holy Name be not brought forward to testify to a lie, which were perjury and a great sin2. An oath so taken is not only no sin but a religious act. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, said Moses, and by His Name shalt thou swear (Deut. x. 20)8.

xi. 10; xii. 19; Gal. i. 20; Phil. i. 8. Such solemn appeals were usual in the earliest times. God Himself sware unto Abraham (Gen. xxii. 16); Abraham swears by God to deal kindly with Abimelech (Gen. xxi. 23, 24); so also does Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 31); and Jacob swears solemnly to Laban (Gen. xxxi. 53).

p. 803. 3 There can be little doubt but that there is a point at which the multiplication of oaths, even for judicial and similar purposes, tends to lower the moral tone by establishing two stan-dards of truthfulness. The subject is discussed by Lytton in an interesting passage in Harold, q.v.

APPENDIX.

THE LAMBETH ARTICLES.

- i. DURING the Marian persecutions many English divines sought refuge on the Continent and there became associated with the leading Swiss reformers, who were strongly addicted to the predestinarian views of Calvin. On their return to England in Queen Elizabeth's reign they propagated widely the system of Geneva, and entrenched themselves firmly in the University of Cambridge, where they enlisted the services of not a few zealous, able, and determined men in opposing the whole system of the English Church. Of this party Thomas Cartwright, fellow of Trinity, became the acknowledged leader, and his appointment to the Margaret Professorship of Divinity in 1569 increased his influence. After some little time another pronounced advocate of predestinarian views was found in Dr Whitaker, a keen polemic and Regius Professor of Divinity, and under his influence and that of others holding similar opinions, Puritanism found at Cambridge a strong centre for disseminating Calvinistic opinions1.
- ii. The exertions of Archbishop Whitgift had secured in the Elizabethan statutes of the University a formidable preponderance of influence for the Heads of Colleges, and he and some other bishops were inclined to take part with the Heads, and espousing the popular side which was inclined to predestinarian tenets, to condemn the late band of orthodox divines, who wished "to raise their scheme of divinity upon the noble foundations of the Fathers, the Councils, and the ecclesiastical historians 1." In 1595 the archbishop, who was a strong disciplinarian and regarded conformity to the law, ecclesiastical and civil, as the first duty of an English subject, thought by assimilating the doctrines of the English Church to the doctrines of Calvin, who had become what the "Master of the Sentences" had been in the palmy days of the Scholastic philosophy, to reconcile the Puritan party, and render them innocuous to the Government. Accordingly there met together at Lambeth Palace Dr Fletcher, Bishop of London, Dr Vaughan, Bishop of Bangor, and Dr Tyndall, Dean of Ely, and the Calvinistic divines from Cambridge, and drew up what are called "The Lambeth Articles."

- iii. These Articles were nine in number, and they laid down the following propositions:—
- i. Deus ab æterno prædestinavit quosdam ad vitam, et quosdam ad mortem reprobavit.
- ii. Causa movens aut efficiens prædestinationis ad vitam non est prævisio fidei aut perseverantiæ, aut bonorum operum, aut ullius rei quæ insit in personis prædestinatis, sed sola voluntas bene placiti Dei.
- iii. Prædestinatorum præfinitus et certus est numerus, qui nec augeri nec minui potest.
- iv. Qui non sunt prædestinati ad salutem, necessario propter peccata sua damnabuntur.

- i. God hath from eternity predestinated certain persons to life, and hath reprobated certain persons unto death.
- ii. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works, or of anything that is in the persons predestinated; but the alone will of God's good pleasure.
- iii. The predestinate are a predetermined and certain number, which can neither be lessened nor increased.
- iv. Such as are not predestinated to salvation shall inevitably be condemned on account of their sins.

Le Bas, Life of Laud, p. 6, quoted in Hardwick's Reformation, p. 242.

- v. Vera, viva et justificans fides, et spiritus Dei sanctificans non extinguitur, non excidit, non evanescit in electis, aut finaliter aut totaliter.
- vi. Homo vere fidelis, id est, fide justificante præditus, certus est plerophoria fidei, de remissione peccatorum suorum et salute sempiterna sua per Christum.
- vii. Gratia salutaris non tribuitur, non communicatur universis hominibus, qua servari possint, si voluerint.
- viii. Nemo potest venire ad Christum nisi datum ei fuerit, et nisi Pater eum traxerit. Et omnes homines non trahuntur a Patre ut veniant ad filium.
- ix. Non est positum in arbitrio aut potestate uniuscujusque hominis servari.

- v. The true, lively, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God sanctifying is not extinguished, doth not utterly fail, doth not vanish away in the elect, either finally or totally.
- vi. A true believer, that is, one who is endowed with justifying faith, is certified by the full assurance of faith that his sins are forgiven, and that he shall be everlastingly saved by Christ.
- vii. Saving grace is not allowed, is not imparted, is not granted to all men, by which they may be saved if they will.
- viii. No man is able to come to Christ, unless it be given him, and unless the Father draw him; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to His Son.
- ix. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved.
- iv. These Articles, asserting the extreme views of the Calvinistic system, were too pronounced for the Queen or statesmen like Burghley to accept, and were abhorrent to the rising school of theologians represented by Andrewes and Overall. To Andrewes the statements contained in the first and last of the Articles seemed to be a direct incentive to lawlessness. "They were charging God with cruelty," said Burghley, "and might make men desperate in their wickedness." Moreover the prelates, who drew them up at Whitaker's suggestion acted without authority, for they were not assembled in synod. The meeting was a mere private conference, and the Articles had no synodical authority. Whitgift was severely censured afterwards by Elizabeth for the whole proceeding, and so,

- <sup>1</sup> See Strype, Whitgift, p. 462. For Hooker's view of the Lambeth Articles, see his Works, i. p. cii. et passim; Saravia's in Strype, Whitgift, Bk. iv. Append. xxiv.; Bishop Andrewes in his Minor Works, pp. 289–300, Lib. Anglo-Cath. Theo.
- They were, however, again brought forward and rejected at the Hampton Court Conference in 1604. The efforts of the Puritans to secure the official recognition of these Articles is strong evidence of the non-Calvinistic character of the Articles of 1571.

ADDITIONAL NOTES.

Article ii, p. 45. Add to Note 2 the following words:

The phrase "ex illius substantia naturam humanam assumpsit" is an implicit denial of the Apollinarian heresy "ipsam Verbi naturam...esse discissam; quasi aliud ejus permaneret in Deo, aliud vero versum fuisset in carnem...ex una Christi Divinitate duas...factas esse substantias." Article vi, p. 99, Note 2. Add:

Yet the Holy Orthodox Church is virtually in agreement with the Article. In her view all dogma in the technical sense of the term is Veritas Revelata, and in the words of one of her most distinguished Theologians, "en effet, il n'existe pas proprement aucun dogme ecclésiastique qui se puisse distinguer des dogmes bibliques; du moins, il n'en existe aucun de ce genre dans L'Église Orthodoxe." Macaire, Theol. Dogm. Orth., i. 2 (21) F. T.

Article vi, p. 103, Note 4. Add:

The Article does not assert that "Holy Scripture containeth expressly all things necessary to salvation." Indeed the phrase "may be proved thereby" contemplates implicit as distinct from explicit statements. The hermeneutical tradition which our Church accepts is accepted also by the Roman Church; "item Sacram Scripturam juxta eum sensum quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater Ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione Sacrarum Scripturarum admitto; nec eam umquam, nisi juxta unanimem consensum Patrum accipiam et interpretabor." Article x, p. 157. Add to Note 3 the following words:

S. Bernard, in his Treatise De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, explaining that Sin does not deprive the Will of Freedom, distinguishes Liberum Arbitrium from Liberum Consilium and Liberum Complacitum, the two latter being (the one the lower and the other the higher) degrees of Goodness of Will vouchsafed in the state of Grace and in the state of Glory respectively. Freedom of Will simply expresses the causal relation of character, good or bad, to action; wherever there exists what we understand by character, there exists also Freedom of Will; but, and this is what S. Bernard means by his distincton, action corresponds with character, indeed it is essential to Freedom of Will that it should do so; for action not in correspondence with character would be not free and moral but compulsory and natural; Grace respects Freedom of Will just because it is an influence upon character. Article xi. Add a Note to p. 162, on (ii) the Source and History of the Article, as follows:

Whatever may be said as to the Lutheran source of the Article, the phrase "propter meritum Domini ac Servatoris nostri Jesu Christi, per fidem, non propter opera et merita nostra" is quite evidently (even if, which is not certain, it was adapted from the Würtemberg Confession) not solifidian; for the question, thus stated, is one as between not merely, nor chiefly, faith and works, but our merits and Christ's merits; in other words, Justification is with the Article, as with Holy Scripture, Justification by Faith and Grace.

S. Augustine's remark is suggested by the fact that Pelagius includes the Blessed Virgin among those "qui juste vixisse referuntur." Pelagius speaks of her as "quam sine peccato confiteri necesse esse pietati." The context concerns actual sin only, but Roman theologians claim the state-

 According to this view, so we must in fairness admit, the Immaculate Conception is not regarded as effected apart from the Merits of our Lord, the Saviour of Mankind;

(2) Taking, as Roman theologians do, Conception to be the union with the Body of the already existent Rational Soul, the Immaculate Conception would imply that the soul of S. Mary, created without Original Righteousness and so in Original Sin, was the recipient at Conception of a quite unique "emundatio a peccato originali", a kind of pre-natal Baptism. Comp. Gaume, Catéchisme de Persévérance, vii. pp. 416 sqq., Paris, 1872, and the authorities quoted in loc-

Article xxv, p. 297:

The observations Sacramentum. of the present Bishop of Salisbury on the etymology of this word are deserving of attention. "The origin of the term Sacramentum," he says, "is generally explained on the authority of Varro, from the sacred place (ad pontem) where it was deposited pendente lite. 'Sacramentum a sacro... ad pontem (sometimes corrected, but needlessly, ad pontificem) deponebant ...Qui judicio vicerat, suum sacramentum e sacro auferebat, victi ad ærarium redibat.' L. L. v. 180. But it would seem much more in harmony with the other uses of the word and its cognates, to explain it in its original meaning, as an oath calling down the wrath of heaven if the swearer was perjured. Cp. Festus, pp. 344, 345, M., sacramento dicitur quod (jurisjurandi sacrati)one interposita actum (est; unde quis sacramen)to dicitur interrogari... The oath of the justice of the cause defended, and the religious penalty it involved (perhaps loss of civil rights, cp. sacer esto), must in process of time have been commuted for a payment in kind, or money, at a fixed rate. And though the oath seems to have continued, it naturally got to be regarded as less important than the deposit of money which accompanied it, so that the latter acquired, in time, the name of Sacramentum exclusively, and was variously explained by Varro, and, once at least, by Verrius Flaccus (the original of Festus), as derived from some connection of place or usage with religion. Modern writers have universally followed them...and this is remarkable, seeing that the metaphors taken from the process justo, or injusto sacramento contendere, etc. (Cic. de Or. i. 42, pro Mil. 75, pro Domo, 78, pro Cacina, 97), seem necessarily to imply the assertion of the rightfulness of a cause, such as in old times must have taken the form of an oath. The taxation of the Sacramentum at so many asses was, no doubt, the work of the decemvirs, who seem rightly to be credited with the introduction of coined money." ## Article xxviii, p. 343:

Transubstantiation. If ever there lived a man most tenderly conscientious, it was Bernard Gilpin, "the Apostle of the North." While he was at the palace of his uncle, Cuthbert Tunstal of Durham, early in Mary's reign, that Bishop's Chaplains, staunch Romans, knowing of Gilpin's efforts at Reform, and wishful to entangle him, began to ply him concerning the Presence. answered that he had no strong argument wherewith in his judgment he might oppose the Real Presence, for "I suppose," said he, "that therein lieth hid a great mystery, such a one as is above my capacity; rather to be adored than disputed upon." The Chaplains then asked what he thought of Transubstantiation. He replied "that there was no necessity why we should believe those things which have no solid ground in the Word of

The night was cold, and the aged prelate sat in his chair before the fire. Conversation was in an undertone, for they thought him asleep. But the Bishop had heard it all. Opening his eyes, he looked over his chair, and said, "Father's soul, let him alone, for he hath more learning than you all." Dr Chr. Wordsworth, Eccl. Biog. vol. iv, p. 104 sqq., Ed. 1818.

XII.

Article xxix. p. 347. Add a Note to the word "hurt" in line 12:

The compilers of the Articles were not ignorant, indeed had ample evidence in the practice of various sectaries of their day, of the law of reaction, in accordance with which an excessive infrequency of Communion would readily tend to replace itself by an equally excessive and equally perilous frequency. The insistence of Article xxv. upon the due use of the Sacraments generally is here applied specially to the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist, with the added warning that due use is no mere synonym for frequent use.

XIII.

Article xxix. p. 348, Note 3. Add:

The words in italics in S. Aug. Tract. in S. Joann. xxvi. § 18 were rejected by the Benedictine Editors on the ground of lack of MSS. evidence for them. But supposing they are genuine, they are far from express-ing Receptionist doctrine. The unworthy recipient is described as one "qui non manet in Christo, et in quo non manet Christus," and it is said of him that "procul dubio nec manducat (spiritualiter) carnem Ejus, nec bibit Ejus sanguinem." On the other hand, to receive worthily is "in Christo manere," and "manducare illam Escam (i.e. carnem Meam)." A reference to § 15 ad fin. of the Tractate shows "manducare" to be equivalent to "particeps esse." Thus the unworthy recipient is not, the worthy recipient is "particeps" of the Body of Christ. To say, however, that the unworthy recipient is not "particeps" of the Res Sacramenti is not to say that the Res Sacramenti is not "taken," even "taken and eaten," in such a case. In the Church Catechism it is stated that the Body and Blood of Christ

"are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper." Here "received" is more than "taken," just as in the words of administration "feed upon Him" is more than "take and eat This." So here "manducare" and "particeps esse" are more than "sumere," and, as if to make it evident that "manducare" has here the fuller meaning of so receiving the Res as also to receive the Virtus, the word "spiritualiter" is added pleonastically, and therefore emphatically, as though S. Augustine would urge, "when I say 'nec manducat' I mean that the unworthy recipient 'non manet in Christo, that he does not feed upon Christ to his profit, 'non manducat spiritualiter.'" But there is something upon which he does feed, alas! to no profit, something which "ad judicium sibi manducat." What is that? It is "tantæ Rei Sacramentum" not "tantæ Virtutis Sacramentum." That which he "premit dentibus" is no mere Sacramentum of an absent Virtus, but the very "Sacramentum Corporis et Sanguinis Christi," which agrees with the words of S. Augustine elsewhere, when he says of unworthy recipients "ipsi quippe adducti sunt ad mensam Christi, et accipiunt de Corpore et Sanguine Ejus; sed adorant tantum, non etiam saturantur, quoniam non imitantur." How else are we to distinguish here "accipere" from "saturari," if not as marking the difference between "receiving the Res Sacramenti" from "receiving the Virtus Sacramenti"? Comp. S. Aug. De Grat. #### XIV.

Article xxxi. p. 358. Note:

i. It is to be carefully kept in mind that the Article is primarily concerned with the "Unica Christi oblatio in Cruce perfecta." This is elaborately and distinctly drawn out in the first clause: "Oblatio Christi semel facta, perfecta est redemptio, propitiatio, et satisfactio pro omnibus peccatis totius mundi, tam originalibus quam actualibus." Here we notice (1) the number of words used to set forth the completeness and all-sufficiency of our Lord's sacrifice of Himself once made on the Altar of His Cross; (2) the reiteration of the language of the Second Article, as to the completeness of that Sacrifice "for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual." This strong assertion of the sufficiency of our Lord's sacrifice no less for actual than for original sin, occurring twice in the xxxix. Articles, plainly indicates some error popularly entertained, which it was very necessary to refute, as implying an ignorance on the part of many men "of their very true and perfect salvation through the death of Jesus Christ<sup>1</sup>." This error, as the language of Latimer<sup>2</sup> and Gardiner<sup>3</sup> attest for England, and the Augsburg Confession for the Continent4, was the view that for sins committed before Baptism and for original sin, men must look to the sacrifice of the Cross. but for actual sins committed after Baptism, to the Sacrifice of the Mass, which is therefore to be daily repeated and reiterated. This opinion may or may not have been held by Albertus Magnus and Catharinus<sup>5</sup>, but that it was a common popular error in the middle of the Sixteenth Century cannot be denied, and accounts for the fact that the Article insists for the second time on what had already been asserted in Article ii., that our

ii. Now where had the error received the most marked expression? What brought it most prominently before the notice of ordinary people? What more clearly than the system of private Masses which the Chantries Act of 1547 was passed in order to put down? Here we see the sequence of the second sentence of the Article, and the force of the word "unde" indicating that the statement is a corollary from the main subject of the Article; and the words "quibus vulgo dicebatur" make it clear that the corollary is not dogmatic but historical, the plural "missarum sacrificia" being not the generic term expressive of any formulated tenet, but the graphic description of what was at the time taking place, here, and there and elsewhere, any and every day. It is true that we must not press too far the use of the plural "missarum" instead of "missæ." "But why the plural 'sacrificia'? and why 'sacrifices of Masses' in the English'? May not these plurals point to the iteration of sacrifices professing, each after each, to be an actual and virtually independent propitiation? While, therefore, the language of the Article seems to condemn an error which was as incidental to the public as to the private Masses, its history would suggest that this protest arose in connection with the private Masses, the latest, the most popular, and the most emphatic embodiment of that view of the Mass as propitiatory which is what really conflicts with the principle * Bishop John Wordsworth of Salisbury holds that this treatise of Catharinus, De Veritate incruenti Sacrificii novi et aderni Testamenti, can hardly have been known to the Compilers of the Articles. But he adds, "opiniones Catharini et similium doctorum satis notae erant, vel per se, vel per alios, qui similia apud nos profitebantur." Responsio ad Batavos, p. 23.

iii. That the Article is primarily directed against private Masses seems clear, but it is not meant to deny that it is even more comprehensive and touches the idea, then popular, that the Mass itself is a real propitiatory Sacrifice valid independently of the Sacrifice of the Cross. Associated with this was the error that the Mass was something which, having, indeed, ex opere operato, i.e. as God's work, its own intrinsic value, therefore had its wholesome effect or operation apart from any good intention of the doer, and thus procured remission of the pains of Purgatory only of its intrinsic value and independently of human moral effort2. "The popular belief of later times," writes Professor Mozley, "exaggerated the Eucharistic Sacrifice till it became, to all intents and purposes, a real one, and 'the priest offered up Christ on the Altar for quick and dead, to have remission of pain and guilt'; that is to say, offered Him up as a Victim, in a sense which could not be distinguished from that in which He was offered up by Himself on the Cross. It is true that the decree of the Council of Trent (Sess. xxii. c. 2) just saves itself by cautious not to say dissembling language from the extreme and monstrous conclusion that the sacrifice of the Mass is the very same with that upon the Cross...but at the same time it asserts that the sacrifice of the Mass is a really propitiatory sacrifice—vere propitiatorium. undoubtedly there are two senses in which an act may be said to be propitiatory. The act of Christ's sacrifice on the Cross had an original propitiatory power; that is to say, it was the cause of any other act, or any act of man, or any rite being propitiatory, that is, appeasing God's anger, and reconciling Him to the agent. We may allow that in common language a man may do something which will reconcile God to him, and restore him to God's favour; but then all the power that any action of man can have for this end is a derived power, derived from Christ's sacrifice, from which any other sacrifice, the Eucharistic one included, borrows its virtue, and without which it would be wholly null and void. There is, then, an original propitiation and a borrowed propitiation, a first propitiation and a secondary one. Why then did the Fathers of Trent, when they had all human language at their command, deliberately choose to call the sacrifice of the Mass, vere propitiatorium? They may have said that it was vere propitiatorium in the secondary sense; but no one can fail to see the misleading effects of such language, and that nothing would have been easier to the Divines of Trent, had they chosen, than to draw a far more clear distinction than they did between the sacrifice of the Mass and the sacrifice on the Cross. It is evident that, as ecclesiastical statesmen, they were afraid of interfering with the broad popular established view of the Mass, while, as theologians, they just contrived to secure themselves from the responsibility of a monstrous dogmatic statement." Article xxxi, p. 367. Note:

2 It is just to say that the Council of Trent, Sess. xxii. c. 2, insists upon the condition "si cum vero corde et recta fide, cum metu et reverentia, contriti et pœnitentes ad Deum

Guest's, entitled A Treatise againste the prevee masse in the behalfe and furtheraunce of the moost holye communyon made by Edmund Gest. MDXLVIII. It is reprinted in Appendix i. of Dugdale's Life and Character of Edmund Geste. Ed. 1840. The following passages are quite evidently condemnatory of no authoritative Roman teaching, but of vulgo dicta such as is that contemplated by the Article, "Howe can it possible be that Christes bodye which cannot be mayde holyer and perfecter than already it is, shuld or myght be consecrat of the priest...ther is no creature, be it neuer so imperfyte that is ofte made, howe than can Christes bodye be ofte made, that is the most perfyte." pp. 77, 78. In this connection Bishop Guest condemns also the vulgo dictum, mentioned by the Bishop of Salisbury, Responsio ad Batavos, p. 11, Ed. 1895, that the Priest in the Mass creates Christ: compare Stella Clericorum, folio B. ii. 2, Ed. 1498, "Iste qui creavit me, dedit mihi creare se: qui creavit me sine me, creatur mediante me." Again. we read in the Treatise in question. "Paul sayth not wyth a manyfold or renewed but with one offering hath Christe made perfecte for ever the sanctified. In consyderacion whereof they bee foule deceaved who avouche Christes sacrifice ought to be revived and multiplied to the ful pardon and contentacion of our synne otherwyse unpardonable, and therefore repete the sayd sacryfyce day by day to the same effect." pp. 87, 88. But some wot saye the priest may supplye the person both of the institour exhybitour and receyver of thee masse supper, therfor it is the Lordes. Yf thys that is objected were true, then mought one baptysme hymselve, assolye hymselve.....annoynte hymselve." pp. 121, 122. "He had us sever the consecrate breade charitablye among us and not eche of us to reserve it to hymselve, and to eate uncharytablye al alone as the prest dothe." p. 124. This is the type of abuse in teaching and in practice contemplated by the Compilers; Bishop Guest has here in view quite definitely "the prevee masse," and the main conclusion of his Treatise is couched in words that almost remind one of the Article, "Thus it is plane that ye private masse supper is to be discontynued and surcesed as blasphemous to God and annoyous to the practycioners therof, and the devocyon and holyness, that is supposed to be in the usage thereof is mere ydolatrye and superstycion, and so both dampnable and exchevable." The strength of the language is to be measured by the fact that, as matters stood at the time, abuses no more essential to the Sacrifice of the Mass than was the sin of the Corinthians who discerned not the Lord's Body, were intimately associated with the Private Mass.

Article xxxvii, p. 420. Add to the end of § xi the following Note:

The question at issue between England and Rome is not so much that of the Primacy of the Bishop of Rome, as the question whether or not that Primacy involves Universal Jurisdiction in the sense that the potestas of the Episcopate is everywhere derived not from the See over which a Bishop presides, but from the Pope as the Universal Pastor Ordinarius. This claim to be the Ordinary of every Christian it was which constituted the abuse so indignantly resented in England not only at the Reformation, but from time to time during the preceding centuries.

APPENDIX TO THE NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

I.

THE REFORMATIO LEGUM ECCLESIASTICARUM.

THE tendency of certain of the Bishops, during the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII., had been to exaggerate the Royal Supremacy to such an extent as to suggest that it included spiritual jurisdiction. But under Edward VI. Cranmer and others took alarm at the prospect and fell back upon the Canon Law to support the jurisdiction of the Bishops. We have evidence of the difficulty in which they found themselves in the following entries in the Journal of the House of Lords under date November 14 and 18, 1549. "Hodie questi sunt episcopi, contemni se a plebe, audere autem nihil pro potestate sua administrare, eo quod per publicas quasdem denuntiationes quas proclamationes vocant, sublata esset penitus sua jurisdictio, adeo ut neminem judicio sistere, nullum scelus punire, neminem ad aedem sacram cogere, neque cetera id genus munia ad eos pertinentia exequi auderent." This complaint was received with sympathy and the Bishops were invited to draw up a Bill. Accordingly on November 18 "Hodie lecta est billa pro jurisdictione episcoporum et aliorum ecclesiasticorum, quae cum proceribus, eo quod episcopi nimis sibi arrogare viderentur, non placeret, visum est deligere prudentes aliquot viros utriusque ordinis, qui habita matura tantae rei inter se deliberatione, referrent toti consilio quid pro ratione temporis et rei necessitate in hac causa agi expediret." The persons appointed were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, Durham and Lichfield together with the Lord Chief Justice Montague and Lords Dorset, Wharton and Stafford. Two years later, in 1551, commissioners, half clerical, half lay, were appointed by Act of Parliament to draw up a new code of Canons. This code is the collection known as Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum. The intention was to refer it to another set of commissioners, before being promulgated, but this never took place as Edward VI. died shortly afterwards and nothing further was done in the matter.

The Reformatio is interesting as throwing light upon the Articles, dealing, as it does, in detail here and there with the contemporary errors of the Anabaptist and other sectaries. Its tendency is certainly conservative. In its remarks upon discipline it might even be considered reactionary, for it owed its origin to an anxiety to reestablish a strong ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the hands of the Bishops. The writ De hacretico comburendo was still on the Statute Book, and the Reformatio contemplates a drastic method with heresy. "Cum sic penitus insederit error, et tam alte radices egerit, ut nec sententia quidem excommunicationis ad veritatem reus inflecti possit, tum consumptis omnibus aliis remediis, ad extremum ad civiles magistratus ablegetur puniendus" (Cap. 4). With regard to the meaning of "puniendus" the Harleian MS. of the Reformatio (426) adds here, "vel ut in perpetuum pellatur exilium, vel ad aeternas carceris deprimatur tenebras, vel alioqui pro magistratus prudenti consideratione plectendus, ut maxime illius conversioni expedire videntur." Considering what was known at the time concerning the antinomian teaching and libertine conduct of the Continental Anabaptists and of such sectaries as the Family of Love or Davidians (founded by a Dutchman, David George) in England, we cannot be surprised at the proposal to invoke the civil power (Hallam, Constit. Hist. i. pp. 100 ff.; Hardwick, Hist. Articles, pp. 86 ff.; Burnet, Hist. ii. pp. 197 ff.; Collier, Eccl. Hist. pp. 326 ff.).

II.

THE ECLECTICISM OF ELIZABETH.

Those who favoured moderation in the treatment of the affairs of religion had much for which to thank the character of Elizabeth. The Queen had her predilections; but, where her self-esteem was not offended, she could be reasonable and just. She liked a certain amount of ceremony in public worship; she objected to the removal of images; she burnt tapers before the Crucifix in her own chapel. After the issue of her Injunctions of 1559 ordering the destruction of the Roods, she appears to have repented of her hasty action in the matter, and it was only with great difficulty that she was persuaded by Bishop Jewell and others not to restore them (Burnet, Hist. ii. p. 294). Whatever may be said as to her political motives for assimilating public worship to that modified form of the old use which was favoured by the German Lutheran Princes, her own personal likings counted for much. In or about 1570 the Crucifix was restored to the Royal Chapel.

feelings in her attitude towards the marriage of the Clergy. She did not like it and she therefore discouraged it. The Injunctions of 1559 dealt strictly on this point, and doubtless their strictness was not uncalled for, considering the obvious danger of reaction from the custom hitherto prevalent. Clerical marriage was not presenting the picture of discretion and sobriety which was desirable. Accordingly the Injunctions required, in the case of clerical marriage, the permission of the Bishop, of two magistrates to whom the bride was known, and, if she were an orphan, of her master or mistress. In the case of Bishops, there was required, in addition, the permission of the Metropolitan and of special Royal Commissioners. The statute of Mary, by which the offspring of clerical marriages was illegitimate, was not repealed until James I. ascended the throne (Burnet, Hist. ii. pp. 395 ff.; Strype, Annals, i. p. 8; Hallam, Constit. Hist. i. pp. 173 f.).

The changes instituted in the Prayer-Book at the beginning of her reign, such, for example, as the omission of the well-known petition in the Litany for deliverance "from the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities," and of the so-called "Black Rubric," bear the stamp of the Oueen's preference for moderation, and of her horror of any disrespect paid to the sacred convictions of the past. Indeed it may be doubted whether, but for the support given by the Recusants to Mary Queen of Scots, and the disaffection fomented amongst them by the Jesuits and by emissaries of the Court of Spain, approved as it all was by the Bull of Pius V., deposing Elizabeth, the Queen would even have allowed the harsh measures which were actually taken against them. The strong preferences of the last of the Tudors, capricious enough as they may sometimes appear to have been, determined a great deal more than is often supposed the actual form of the religious settlement at the end of the Sixteenth Century. Under many another monarch the reaction after the reign of Mary might have been violent. Elizabeth had both the inclination and the opportunity to fix once for all a certain sane, reasonable, balanced moderation as typical of the English Church.

III.

THE PERSONALITY OF GOD.

The transition of thought, whereby the mind passes from the idea of infinity to that of an infinite Personality, is one of which we take no sufficient account. That such a transition takes place as a constructive step in the genesis of the religious convictions of many men may, perhaps, be doubted. The question of its inverse occurrence in the analysis of religious conviction is another matter. We feel it to be unsatisfactory that personality should be the one concept left outside the infinite. Again, that there may be an infinite love, an infinite justice, an infinite veracity, in short that moral attributes may be infinite, and that there may be no corresponding Personality, by means of Which they have effect, seems to be meaningless, idle, unprofitable. If what we understand by a moral attribute exist anywhere in perfection, it can exist only as exercised by a personal will. The figure of speech by which we speak of a righteous law presupposes a righteous will of which it is the expression; deny such a will and the action of the law itself, whatever may be said of its effect, becomes solely a matter of physics, or mechanics, or the like. A law of morals is not an invariable sequence, an inevitable conformity, it is an exercise of power. If we are able, in the course of history, to recognize "a power that makes for righteousness," then, such a power is will-power; and will-power is personal; and yet, the Personality behind the righteous tendencies, of which we find traces, differs toto coelo from our limited human personality, differs, simply, as the Infinite from the finite. Upon the whole subject we may consult the Monologion and Proslogion of S. Anselm. See also Browning, Bishop Blougram's Apology.

IV.

MIND IN THE UNIVERSE.

"The answer of Laplace to Napoleon's question, why he had not in his Mécanique Céleste mentioned the name of God, is familiar to all: 'Sir, I had no need of that hypothesis.' Not so generally known, I believe, but equally brilliant, was the instant response of Lagrange on hearing the Emperor's prompt report of the memorable conversation: 'Nevertheless, that is an hypothesis that accounts for many things.'" (Professor C. J. Keyser, The Message of Modern Mathematics to Theology, Hibbert Journal, Jan. 1909.)

Neither did Laplace mean to be irreverent and exclusively scientific, nor did Lagrange mean to be pious and unscientific. Each gave expression to a temper of mind. Both these tempers may coexist in the same person. Mechanics offer an explanation of the Universe and we cannot quarrel with them for doing so. But God is not a machine. Mechanics offer an explanation of a modern locomotive. But the engineer who designed it is not a machine. The two tempers coexisted in Bacon, in Spinoza, in Descartes. They coexist in more men and women than, perhaps, we think. The most scientific intelligence may ask the questions, Has the Universe a purpose? Does it mean something, as the expression of a mind? The most pious soul will at times feel the pressure of mechanical forces. Kosmos grinds on; it is everything, so it seems, but purposeful. We may often feel with Laplace that we have no need of the hypothesis of God, but there will always remain the "Nevertheless" of Lagrange.

V.

CREATION.

S. Athanasius discusses, in the second chapter of the De Incarnatione, various views which have been held as to the origin of the Universe. He refers first to the Epicurean doctrine that things came into existence by blind chance and independently of any impulse, any Primum Movens, outside themselves (αὐτομάτως, καὶ ώς ἔτυχε, τὰ πάντα γεγενήσθαι λέγουσιν). This he rejects as failing to account for the differentiation which we find everywhere (¿δει τά πάντα άπλως γεγενησθαι, καὶ όμοια εἶναι, καὶ μὴ διάφορα... ή δὲ τοιαύτη διάταξις, οὐκ αὐτομάτως αὐτὰ γεγενῆσθαι γνωρίζει). Next comes the Platonic theory of creation out of eternally pre-existent matter (ἐκ προϋποκειμένης καὶ ανενήτου ύλης). This, however, is a reflection upon the Divine Omnipotence (ἀσθένειαν περιτιθέασι τῶ Θεῶ). This leaves something outside the Divine creation, something upon which God is dependent for the fulfilment of the creative act (καθ' ὑπόθεσιν γὰρ εἰ μὴ ἦν ἡ ὕλη, οὐκ αν εἰργάσατο τι ὁ Θεός· καὶ πῶς ἔτι ποιητὴς καὶ δημιουργὸς ầν λεχθείη, ἐξ ἑτέρου τὸ ποιεῖν ἐσχηκῶς, λέγω δὴ ἐκ τῆς ὕλης;). Last he speaks of the Gnostic conception of a demiurge, distinct from God, a conception derived from Oriental dualism, and involving the depreciation of created existence as being the work of at best an inferior intelligence, possibly of a will opposed to that of God. On this view God can have no benevolent concern with the creature, who belongs not to Himself, but to another (ξένην τοῦ Πατρὸς τὴν κτίσιν εἰσάγουσι). He then proceeds in the third chapter to give the Christian doctrine upon the subject.

- (a) The Universe had no pre-existence, in any sense, apart from God (μηδαμῶς ὑπάρχοντα τὰ ὅλα);
- (β) It came into existence (εἰς τὸ εἶναι) out of the non-existent (ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων),
- (γ) By an irrevocable and permanent act of God  $(\pi \epsilon \pi o \iota \eta \kappa \epsilon' \nu a \iota \tau \delta \nu \Theta \epsilon \delta \nu)$ ,
- (8) Through the instrumentality of the Word ( $\delta\iota\dot{a}$   $\tau o\hat{v}$   $\Lambda \dot{o}\gamma ov$ ).

Moreover, behind it all was a motive, a moral motive. God is essentially and necessarily the source of all good  $(\pi\eta\gamma\dot{\eta}\ \tau\dot{\eta}s\ \dot{a}\gamma a\theta \dot{o}\tau\eta\tau os\ \dot{v}\pi\dot{a}\rho\chi\epsilon\iota)$ . It belongs to goodness to be self-communicative  $(\dot{a}\gamma a\theta\dot{\phi}\ \delta\dot{\epsilon}\ \pi\epsilon\rho\dot{\iota}\ o\dot{v}\delta\epsilon\nu\dot{\delta}s\ \dot{a}\nu\ \gamma\dot{\epsilon}\nu o\iota\tau o\ \dot{\phi}\theta\dot{o}\nu os)$ , and thus God in creation communicated life outside Himself  $(\ddot{\delta}\theta\epsilon\nu\ o\dot{v}\delta\epsilon\nu\dot{\iota}\ \tauo\dot{v}\ \dot{\epsilon}\dot{\iota}\nu a\iota\ \phi\theta o\nu\dot{\eta}\sigma as$ ,  $\dot{\epsilon}\xi\ o\dot{\iota}\kappa\ \ddot{o}\nu\tau\omega\nu\ \tau\dot{a}\ \pi\dot{a}\nu\tau a\ \pi\epsilon\pi o\dot{\iota}\eta\kappa\epsilon)$ . S. Athanasius proceeds to show how generous was the Divine gift, for God not only created  $\ddot{a}\lambda o\gamma a\ \zeta\dot{\omega}a$ , which by the fact that they came into existence  $(\kappa a\tau\dot{a}\ \tau\dot{o}\nu\ \tau\dot{\eta}s\ \dot{\iota}\delta\dot{\iota}as\ \gamma\epsilon\nu\dot{\epsilon}\sigma\epsilon\omegas\ \lambda\dot{o}\gamma o\nu)$  cannot live for ever, but He created man, not simply as a perishable being  $(o\dot{\iota}\chi\ \dot{a}\pi\lambda\dot{\omega}s)$ , but as a being with an eternal destiny  $(\kappa a\tau\dot{a}\ \tau\dot{\eta}\nu\ \dot{\epsilon}a\nu\tau o\hat{\nu}\ \dot{\epsilon}\dot{\iota}\kappa\dot{o}\nu a)$ ; this wonderful gift of an attribute of the Uncreated to the created being motived by the boundless love of God, so that if we ask, How could this be? the sufficient answer is, Because God loved so much.

Strictly, creation may be said to represent the point of contact between the Infinite and the finite, between the Unconditioned and the conditioned, between the Eternal and the temporal. Thus creation proper does not offer itself to scientific investigation, whereas all the primaeval processes following upon creation certainly do so offer themselves, for they belong to the sphere of the finite, of the conditioned, of the temporal. It may be said that God is self-limited by creation, in that the Infinite, the Unconditioned, the Eternal is revealed in the finite, the conditioned, the temporal. It is of the nature of love to express itself by self-limitation. We cannot know love otherwise than as self-limited.

VI.

THE CIRCUMINCESSION.

By such a term Western theologians have sought to express the common activity of the Three Persons in the Holy Trinity. "Tres Personae, sicut inseparabiles sunt, ita inseparabiliter agunt." The Easterns use the term  $\pi\epsilon\rho\iota\chi\omega\rho\eta\sigma\iota$ s. And the underlying truth is an important one. If we remember it carefully, we avoid thinking and speaking tritheistically. We avoid setting, as it were, the mercy of the Son over against the justice of the Father. We are in no danger of mistaking the tendency which is revealed in the cultus of the Sacred Heart among the Romans, or in that manner of devotion found in other Christian bodies also, which has been expressively called "Jesus-Worship." We avoid also crude notions of the Atonement, which reflect upon the moral character of the Divine Being. Against such notions Robert Barclay, the Quaker, protested when he wrote in his Apology for the True Christian Divinity<sup>1</sup>, "It is probably safe to say that only along the line of thought here indicated—that of the identification of Christ with God on the one hand, and man on the other, which is the kernel of the theology of Paul and John-will the Atonement hold its place in the minds of thinking men. The crude doctrine of substitution—which rests on the idea of separate personalities, and represents Christ as enduring the wrath of God, suffering instead of us a punishment which had to be inflicted on someone is untrue to the real meaning of the New Testament. The mystics, with one consent, have gone deeper. They have felt out after a thought of 'conjunct' personality, which the psychological study of our own day is rendering more and more intelligible." The language of Barclay is, perhaps, unguarded and open to misunderstanding in the other direction from that of the teaching which he opposes. The principle "sicut inseparabiles sunt, ita inseparabiliter agunt" is a sound and safe one, balanced and corrective.

VII.

THE MONARCHIA IN THE GODHEAD.

The doctrine that there is in the Godhead only one  $a\rho\chi\eta$  or principium was strongly held by the Fathers as a protection against the ever present tendency in the early

centuries to drift into polytheism. Indeed, the doctrine is the complement of that of the Circumincession or Coinherence of the Three Persons in the Trinity. As the Son and the Spirit are  $\hat{\epsilon}_{\nu}$   $\Theta \epsilon \hat{\omega}$  by virtue of the Circumincession, so they are  $\epsilon \kappa \Theta \epsilon o \hat{v}$  by virtue of the Monarchia. Thus the Second Person is  $\partial \nu \Theta \epsilon \hat{\omega}$  as the Word of God, while He is ἐκ Θεοῦ as the Son of God: the two facts are mutually inclusive, and S. Augustine's statement, "Quia Verbum, ideo Filius" (Enarr. in Ps. vii. 14, 5), might with equal truth be inverted, "Ouia Filius, ideo Verbum." The Father alone is  $d\nu a\rho \chi o g$ . He is the  $d\rho \chi \dot{\eta}$  of the Son and of the Spirit, and that without derogating from the proper Deity of either of these Two Persons. Thus the Son is γεννητός because He is Son, but He is αγένητος because He is very God; while the Father is ἀγέννητος, because He is Father. This distinction of ἀγένητος (increatus) from αγέννητος (ingenitus) we owe to the Ante-Nicene writers, and it serves to express at once the Monarchia of the Father and the proper Deity of the Son. Again, both the Father and the Spirit are equally ἀγένητοι as being both of them very God; but the Father alone is avapyos, as being Father, while the Spirit derives from the Father, as being primarily His Spiritus. It is jealousy for the Monarchia of the Father which explains the objection of the Easterns to the Filioque. All that they contend is that the ἐκπόρευσις of the Spirit originates from the Father alone, just as does the γέννησις of the Son. The parallelism is illustrated by the fact that the term  $\pi \rho o \beta o \lambda \dot{\eta}$ , which was used, e.g. by Tertullian (probolé) In Prax. vii. 8, of the Son, is also used by Easterns of later days to express that relation of the Father to the Spirit which Westerns call spiratio.

THE MISSIONS OF THE SON.

A remarkable instance of the way in which the Catholic Church has borrowed from the Pagan world is found in the doctrine of the Λόγος. The λόγος of Plato had come to be regarded, in course of time, as a quasi-personal existence. The Stoics had further distinguished its inward and its outward, its noetic and its aesthetic life, by the terms èvδιάθετος and προφορικός. Here, in philosophical language ready to hand, the Church found a means of expressing her doctrine of the Eternal Word. When the Son is spoken of as the Λόγος ἐνδιάθετος, it is intended to teach that He is eternally in the bosom of the Father (διαπαντός ενδιάθετος έν καρδία Θεοῦ); when He is spoken of as the Λόγος προφορικός, it is intended to teach that He came forth from the Father to create. And, we shall probably not be wrong if we go on to speak of the Son as the Λόγος προφορικός in respect both of the Economy of Grace in the Incarnation and of the Economy of Glory at the Second Advent. Thus the Word appears as rendering service (ὑπηρεσία) to the Father, and as so far subordinate to the Father; but the service is that of One Who is essential to Him Whom He serves, for it belongs to the Divine perfection to be eternally λογικός, the Father never was without the Word (ἄλογος). The Word is, indeed, the Father's instrument; but He is a connaturale instrumentum, of One Nature with Him Who uses Him.

The fitness of the Creative Word to be the Recreative Word enters into the argument of S. Athanasius in the De Incarnatione, and he finds support for his contention in the statement of Plato (Politic. 273), to the effect that όρων τὸν κόσμον ὁ γεννήσας αὐτὸν χειμαζόμενον καὶ κινδυνεύοντα εἰς τὸν τῆς ἀνομοιότητος δύνειν τόπον, καθίσας ἐπὶ τοὺς οἴακας τῆς ψυχῆς βοηθεῖ, καὶ πάντα τὰ πταίσματα διορθοῦται. How natural then that the Λόγος, Who, in the language of Athenagoras, is the ἰδέα καὶ ἐνέργεια of Creation, should fulfil the same office in the work of Recreation (De Incarn. § 43). On the whole subject see Bull, Defensio Fid. Nicaen. ii. and iii. passim, and Newman, Arians of the Fourth Century, Chap. 2.

THE PURPOSE OF THE INCARNATION.

The question of the purpose of the Incarnation was debated in the Schools, and we think of the Thomists as regarding the Incarnation as contingent upon the Fall and of the Scotists as finding in it part of the eternal purpose of God, which took effect in spite of the Fall; so that, with the former the Passion and all that it implies is essential to the Incarnation, while with the latter it is accidental. The two views are, perhaps, coincident with the general type of teaching belonging to each School, the one with the Augustinian, comparatively practical and Western teaching of the Thomists, the other with the more Pelagian and comparatively speculative and Eastern teaching of the Scotists. But, if we accept the Scotist view we are not necessarily involved in Pelagianism or in anything approaching it. We may be sure that in creating man God destined him for Glory, "Tu nos fecisti ad Te, Domine, et inquietum est cor nostrum, donec requiescat in Te"; man is a progressive being; the State of Innocence in which he originally found himself may rightly be regarded as embryonic, it was intended to lead to something. The moral government of God postulates the gift of higher privilege as a reward for the use of lower privilege. On any other suppositions than these the State of Innocence would be a poor, unprofitable thing, at best a state of stagnation, and the Fall would appear to be required as a stimulus to initiate moral growth. We should be obliged to understand the "O felix culpa!" without any qualification; we should find ourselves driven to conclude the necessity of sin. S. Leo makes use of the phrase provectio carnis. Is he not pointing to benefits conferred upon humanity by means of the Incarnation over and above the benefits associated with the Atonement? S. Athanasius has a similar thought of certain positive gains accruing additional to what we think of as salvation from sin. His words recall the "for us men and for our salvation" of the Nicene Creed. Αὐτὸς γὰρ ἐνηνθρώπησεν, ίνα ήμεις θεοποιηθώμεν και αὐτὸς ἐφανέρωσεν έαυτον δια σώματος, ίνα ήμεις του αοράτου Πατρός έννοιαν λάβωμεν. Here, surely, is something more than restoration. Καὶ αὐτὸς ἐπέμεινε τὴν παρ' ἀνθρώπων ὕβριν, ἵνα ήμεῖς ἀθανασίαν κληρονομήσωμεν. Here, on the other hand, we seem to find a suggestion of the κατορθώματα necessitated by the Fall (De Incarn. § 54). It is in any case difficult to think of the Incarnation solely from a soteriological point of view.

The instrumentality of the Divine Word in the Incarnation seems to stand upon an altogether higher level than His instrumentality either in Creation, or as immanent in the Universe. Vita hominis visio Dei. The revelation of the Father (ἴνα ἡμεῖς τοῦ ἀοράτου Πατρὸς ἔννοιαν λάβωμεν), the taking of our humanity up to the very throne of God, to which S. Athanasius refers in striking terms (ἴνα ἡμεῖς θεοποιηθῶμεν), are we to consider such ends as these as contingent upon the Fall? It may be true that both S. Athanasius (De Incarn. § 4; Orat. i. 49; ii. 54) and S. Leo (Serm. 77, in Pentecost. iii. 2) state explicitly otherwise, but their general teaching concerning the Incarnation serves in some measure to lay the foundation for the opposite conclusion. On the whole subject see Westcott, Ep. S. John, pp. 274 ff.; Trench, Cambridge Sermons, p. 10; Lux Mundi, pp. 184 ff., Ed. 1889.

ΤΗΕ ΚΕΝΩΣΙΣ.

The term is derived from the language of S. Paul in Phil. ii. 7, ξαυτον εκένωσε μορφήν δούλου λαβών, κ.τ.λ. And yet, "nunquam destitit esse Deus" (S. Leo, Serm. in Nativ. vii. 2). How then are we to understand the Self-emptying of the Son of God? S. Leo thus answers the question. "Quae autem est Ejus exinanitio, quaeve paupertas, nisi formae servilis acceptio, per quam, Verbi majestate velata, dispensatio humanae redemptionis impleta est?" (Epist. 165, 8; cf. Epist. 124, 7.) The same view is taken by S. Cyril of Alexandria. The further question remains as to what is implied by the "Verbi majestate velata." If the Incarnation itself is the Κένωσις, how are we to understand that great fact so as not to take from the verity of the Manhood assumed thereby? The question is specially interesting as it regards the knowledge of the Son during His sojourn on earth. "This 'self-emptying' of God in the Incarnation is, we must remember, no failure of power, but a continuous act of Self-sacrifice." "His true Godhead is shown in His attitude towards men and things about Him, in His moral and spiritual claims, in His expressed relation to God, not in any miraculous exemptions of Himself from the conditions of natural knowledge in its own proper province" (Gore, Lux Mundi, p. 360, Ed. 1889; see also The Incarnation, pp. 145 ff., pp. 157 ff.; Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation, pp. 71 ff.).

Various interpretations have been given of the meaning of such passages as S. Luke ii. 52; S. Mark xiii. 32. Whatever interpretation we may accept, we must avoid any suggestion of pretended ignorance on our Lord's part. S. Ambrose's statement, "nostrum assumpsit affectum, ut nostra ignoratione nescire se diceret, non quia aliquid Ipse nesciret" (De Fide, v. 18), seems to come very near to such a suggestion. The προέκοπτε of S. Luke ii. 52 expresses a gradual advance as real in regard of knowledge, as of stature and of the favour of His fellows. On the other hand we are confronted with the difficulty that, if the Son of God became incarnate Divina non minuens, and if omniscience belongs to such Divina, we seem to find it necessary to allow that the Babe at Mary's breast knew all that was known to the Only-Begotten in the Bosom of the Father. Again, if we claim that omniscience belongs to the Divine Nature alone and that our Lord knew as God what He did not know as man, we instinctively feel that we are perhaps, postulating a twofold personality and approaching the Nestorian standpoint. And again, if we conclude that omniscience belongs to the Glory of the Godhead, the full and conscious enjoyment of equality with the Father (τδ εἶναι ἴσα Θεφ̂), which our Lord freely surrendered when He became incarnate, we are still in doubt, because omniscience is one thing and the exercise of omniscience is another. Yet our Lord's own words and those of the sacred writer do require us to believe that the Divine omniscience was in some manner surrendered, and the fact is in the same order with that self-limitation of God in all His relations with created being which we can neither explain nor dispute.

XI.

THE VIRGIN BIRTH.

The doctrine of the Virgin Birth of our Lord is one of those historical doctrines of the Creed which are submitted in some quarters to what has been called a mitigating or spiritualizing process. The result in the case of this particular doctrine is that the word "Virgin" is taken to mean a young woman.

We are not concerned with the Hebrew of Isa. vii. 14, but with the language of the New Testament, and with the sense in which it has been understood by the Church. According to S. Matthew the Blessed Virgin was espoused to S. Joseph, but πρὶν ἡ συνελθεῖν αὐτοὺς εὐρέθη ἐν γαστρὶ ἔχουσα. S. Joseph with delicate consideration proposed λάθρα ἀπολῦσαι αὐτήν, but being reassured by a vision, he did not do so. With the exception of the vision of S. Joseph there is nothing miraculous so far, unless it be the very fact that, under such circumstances, S. Joseph, being a Jew, did not put S. Mary away; something most unusual is required to account for this. S. Matthew explains it by stating, in the words of the Angel, τὸ γὰρ ἐν αὐτῆ γεννηθὲν ἐκ Πνεύματός ἐστιν Ἁγίον, and proceeds to

If the non-miraculous facts given by S. Matthew be true, the miraculous explanation is not the least reasonable way of accounting for them, especially if we remember the strong Jewish feeling with regard to pre-nuptial infidelity. It is difficult to see how we can mitigate or spiritualize the non-miraculous facts otherwise than by simply denying them. S. Mark and S. John introduce our Lord with no other preface than the Ministry of the Baptist; they give no Gospel of the Holy Childhood. S. Luke, having told the story of the vision of Zacharias, proceeds to the subject of the Annunciation. Again, with him, we have  $\pi a \rho \theta' \epsilon \nu o \nu$ έμνηστευμένην ανδρί & ὄνομα Ἰωσήφ. This is quite nonmiraculous. Next comes the vision with its promise of a Son, the Davidic King, "Whose kingdom shall have no end." Here the language is plainly Messianic. Let us eliminate the miraculous and suppose an announcement made by someone to S. Mary that she was to be the Mother of Messiah; the announcement might be true or it might be false. How are we to explain her objection (Πως έσται τοῦτο, ἐπεὶ ἄνδρα οὐ γινώσκω;)? She did not expect Messiah to be born of a Virgin. She came of a race which held natural motherhood in the highest esteem. just because it afforded a hope of being the Mother of Messiah. It is not easy to think of the story of the Virgin Birth as owing its origin to a preconceived theory as to how Messiah should be born. According to one modern view the language of Isa. vii. 14 does not imply Virgin Birth. We are not anxious to prove that the Blessed Virgin or her contemporaries understood it in that sense. S. Matthew's use of the prophecy does not necessitate the conclusion that, before the event took place, he understood it to refer to Virgin Birth,

That the Apostolic preaching contains no reference to the subject is explained by the fact that the story which was told was one of historical events of which the Twelve spoke as eye-witnesses; necessarily the Virgin Birth would not find a place in it. S. Paul, on the other hand, writes of Christian faith and morals; historical events are postulated, or come in by the way. The question may be raised as to whether, considering his doctrine of the Second Adam, the Virgin Birth may not rightly be included amongst the events postulated by him. In any case, the doctrine, in quite unequivocal terms, early found a place in the Creeds of the Church. A most striking reference to it is made by S. Ignatius. He includes the παρθενία Μαρίας amongst what he calls the τρία μυστήρια κραυγής, the three great mysteries wrought out in the silence of God and to be revealed by the Church, the other two being the Nativity and the Passion. It may be asked how the doctrine fits into the Christian Economy. We shall remember that the life of Christ has been regarded, even by those who have rejected the full teaching of the Church, as bearing the same relation to the race as does regeneration to the individual. In admitting so much they have admitted the principle underlying S. Paul's doctrine of the New Creation. Even as the First Adam was born by a creative act differing essentially from that whereby his descendants came into the world, so might the Second Adam reasonably be expected to appear under some corresponding condition. It may be said that the New Creation was a moral one. But, surely, it was no narrower than the whole of man. It did not exclude the physical part of his being. The character of our Lord had, seeing that He was very Man, a physical background. If His character was a moral miracle, then was its physical background miraculous also, no less in origin than in fact, Σώμα δὲ κατηρτίσω μοι. There was prepared for the Son a Manhood as an organ whereby He, the Divine Person, might fulfil the will of God. Is it unreasonable that this σώμα, the one σώμα in creation united to a Divine Personality, should have come into existence after a manner peculiar to Itself? See Gore, Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation, The Virgin Birth of Jesus, fassim.

THE ALLEGORICAL THEORY OF THE RESURRECTION.

"Jesus, however, was proclaimed as 'the Lord' not only because he had died for sinners but because he was the risen and living one." How fully we can accept these words of Harnack! And—how disappointed we are to find that he divorces what he calls the Easter faith from the Easter message and claims for so doing the authority of Scripture! "The Lord is risen"; what is this but the Easter message? And what is the Easter faith, but the acceptance of this message as true? But this is not so, we are given to understand. There might have been no Easter message, and yet there ought to be an Easter faith. This is the meaning of the "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed." The Easter faith appears to be the conviction that there is a victory over death. Quite possibly S. Paul did not know of the Easter message; "there are theologians of note who doubt" whether he did! It was the appearances of the Lord that he considered to be all important. And yet, there is no clear account to be given of them, no trustworthy tradition of their occurrence.

As a matter of fact, it is of little importance what happened either at the grave or in regard of the appearances. That faith in the infinite value of the soul which is embedded in the very truth and reality of things, that certainty that man was made for immortality, finds its most imperishable illustration in the conviction that Jesus lives. This conviction is to be firmly held; it represents actual fact. And of this fact the Easter message is an allegory. But "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed." Let us try to live upon the higher plane.

"The highest calling and election," George Eliot said,

"is to do without opium."

Something like this is what is offered by the allegorical theory of the Resurrection. If we were to accept it, we should be obliged to surrender S. Paul's principle of  $X\rho\iota\sigma\tau\delta\dot{s}$   $d\pi a\rho\chi\dot{\eta}$   $\tau\dot{\omega}\nu$   $\kappa\epsilon\kappa\sigma\iota\mu\eta\mu\dot{\epsilon}\nu\omega\nu$ . We should find in the Lord's Resurrection no pledge of our own, for its historical reality would be doubtful. And, indeed, we should be forbidden to ask for pledges.

The theory belongs to that process of mitigating and spiritualizing the Gospel story to which we have already referred. Mitigation it certainly is. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether it succeeds in spiritualizing. The old traditional view of our Lord's actual bodily Resurrection appears to give a dignity to His Manhood, and a continuity to His Incarnate Life, which we otherwise miss. If His Body saw corruption, then what becomes of the indissolubility of the Hypostatic Union? Or, if we allow that that Union affected only the moral side of our Lord's human nature and not the physical also, the admission appears to be out of accord with what we are learning every day of the relations between character and the bodily state. Just as in the case of the denial of the Virgin Birth, so here the denial of bodily Resurrection seems to leave the physical outside the influence of the Incarnation, and that at the very fountain head. If it be true that there is for every Christian, in some measure, a provectio carnis here and now; if the pure heart brings to its possessor "the strength of ten"; then, we should expect to find in the New Adam such an irradiation of His Manhood by the Divine Glory as would naturally involve freedom from bodily corruption.

XIII.

THE GROWTH OF CREEDS.

The earliest types were associated with Baptism, and were at first, perhaps, little more than the expression of the catechumen's acceptance of the truth of the Baptismal formula. But the Creed was also a norma praedicationis for the Primitive Church. As such it was a norma for the instruction of the catechumen, and out of this fact arose the Traditio Symboli. The Symbolum thus delivered during the catechumenate was repeated in the Redditio Symboli at Baptism. The Symbolum was still the expression of an acceptance of the Baptismal formula, but the expression was more elaborate than at first.

In course of time the contact of the Church with Greek thought brought within its borders intellectual forces which, in their independent and exclusive activities, received the name of Gnosticism. They had found an entrance very early in the Church's history, mainly through the synagogue. We find traces of them in the Gentile Churches to which S. Paul and S. John wrote. At first, untempered to the uses of the new religion, these intellectual forces served to emphasize by contrast aspects of the Faith with which they appeared incompatible, such as its universality, its high moral standard, its practical aim. Presently they obtained a foothold from which they were able to do service to the Faith. Having received from it the inspiration of distinctively Christian motives, they proceeded to present the Faith to the world in terms of philosophy, to compose its apology. Later the individual Apologists gave place to schools of Christian philosophy, as at Alexandria. Under such conditions was developed the doctrine of the Λόγος in its later form. Thus out of the contact with and the assimilation of Greek philosophy—an assimilation which of course modified it, but clearly recognized its service as a preparation for Christianity -out of such contact and assimilation grew formulated statements of doctrine, some of which received Conciliar sanction, others of which received in addition to Conciliar sanction the consensus post of the Universal Church. In truth, it was the contest between Greek philosophy as it was but imperfectly adapted to the service of the Church, and the same philosophy as it was wholly loyal and devoted to the same, between the false γνώσις and the true, which evoked such dogmatic statements. In this aspect the Creeds represent the Church's vindication of her right to intellectual truth, as belonging to her Lord and as part of the universal dominion pledged to her in Him.

S. BERNARD ON GRACE AND FREE WILL.

The De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio of S. Bernard is a treatise to be commended to the theological student, no less than the De Erroribus Abaelardi of the same writer. The purpose of the treatise is to vindicate the place of free will in the work of salvation, and to exhibit its relation to the Grace of God. S. Bernard discusses the Divine free will, the free will of the Angels, and the free will of man when under the different conditions constituted by the States of Innocence, of Sin and of Beatitude. The occasion of the treatise was the chance meeting of the writer with a person, not named, who appears to have under-estimated the function of free will. At the outset S. Bernard takes the position that it is only the free will that can be saved. "Tolle liberum arbitrium et non erit quod salvetur; tolle Gratiam, non erit unde salvetur." Salvation is impossible "absque consensu accipientis." "Consentire salvari est." But the consent of the will is not a "naturalis appetitus"; it is a "habitus animi." Any act of the will is a "motus rationalis," taking effect not necessarily "ex ratione," but never "absque ratione," that is to say, making use always of the "ministerium" of reason, but not always of its "consilium sive judicium." There is a threefold liberty. The "libertas Naturae," a "libertas a necessitate"; the "libertas Gratiae," a "libertas a peccato"; and the "libertas Gloriae," a "libertas a miseria." To the second liberty belongs what we call "bona voluntas." We may desire to possess either the "bona voluntas" or the reverse. In either case we exercise the will; "utrobique voluntas, et utrobique libertas; cedit siquidem voluntati necessitas." Thus, be the will good or bad, there is "libertas a necessitate." Having this liberty we have "liberum arbitrium." The possession of the "libertas a peccato" S. Bernard calls "liberum consilium"; the possession of the "libertas a miseria," "liberum complacitum."

But the desire to possess the "bona voluntas" is "velle bonum." All, however, that belongs to us "ex libero arbitrio" is "tantum velle." "Velle bonum" is a "profectus" of the "liberum arbitrium," just as "velle malum" is a "defectus." Whence then comes the "bonum velle"?

"(Liberum arbitrium) ut esset, creans Gratia fecit; ut proficiat, salvans Gratia facit; ut deficiat, ipsum se dejicit. Itaque liberum arbitrium nos facit volentes, Gratia benevolos. Ex ipso nobis est velle, ex ipsa bonum velle."

Speaking of the Fall, S. Bernard says that free will was given to man "non ut proinde peccaret, sed ut gloriosior appareret si non peccaret, cum peccare posset." The Fall is not to be ascribed "dono potestatis, sed vitio voluntatis." Alas, however, "etsi datum fuit voluntati posse stare ne caderet, non tamen resurgere si caderet." Has then free will been lost by the Fall? No, what has been lost is "liberum consilium." Man can still use his will. "Non ergo si potens, aut sapiens, sed tantum si volens esse desierit, liberum arbitrium amisisse putanda erit creatura."

Enough has been said to show the interest of the treatise. The theological student should read it for himself. It would serve to cultivate accuracy of thought. And here it may be well to say that it is much to be desired that the great theological works of the past should be studied in the original by candidates for Holy Orders and by the junior Clergy far more extensively than is the case at present. It is not a frequent thing to find a man who has read and noted and pondered such a masterpiece as the De Incarnatione of S. Athanasius, or the De Trinitate of S. Augustine, to say nothing of the Apostolic Fathers or of the Apologists. "Ars artium regimen animarum." These words of S. Gregory the Great indicate the necessity in which we all stand of sitting at the feet of great masters.

XV.

JUSTIFICATION.

Justification in the merely forensic sense of the term is not felt to be entirely consistent with the moral attributes of God. When an earthly court acquits of a charge it professes not to make an unrighteous man righteous, but to recognize the righteousness of a righteous man; sometimes it does neither the one nor the other, but simply whitewashes a rogue. When God acquits a man, there can be no possibility of such an error of judgment; still less can there be any possibility of a deliberate miscarriage of justice. When God calls a man righteous, He can only do so in so far as the man actually is righteous, always remembering that God looks upon righteousness as essentially a condition of the will. Now the difficulty about the doctrine of imputed righteousness is that it represents God as pronouncing a man righteous, when the man is not righteous but has simply recognized that Someone else is righteous, and that he himself is not. It might, perhaps, be urged that such a recognition of the unrighteousness of self and the righteousness of Another is an act of the will in correspondence with Grace, and so far is righteous. Probably this is quite true, but it is an explanation which surrenders the purely forensic doctrine of Justification. If, however, the forensic doctrine dispenses with such recognition on the part of man as needful for his Justification, then it empties faith of its moral content. The doctrine does not profess to allow that Justification proper is anything more than acquittal. This acquittal is based upon the fact not that the person justified is, in any sense, truly righteous, but that the righteousness of Christ has, by virtue of the act of faith, been treated as though it were the righteousness of the person justified. The righteousness of Christ has not become his, otherwise he would be, in a very true sense, righteous. This, however, is exactly what he is not. He is justified, but he is not righteous. The treating Christ's righteousness as though it were the righteousness of the person justified, when it is not, in any sense, his righteousness, and when, if it were his righteousness, he would not be justified at all, is called the imputation of Christ's righteousness to him.

Now this doctrine appears wholly to ignore the truth of our incorporation in Christ, and to substitute for it a fictitious procedure not altogether worthy of the character of God. The doctrine of infused or imparted righteousness, on the other hand, regards the Grace of God, with which a man corresponds or cooperates by the moral act of faith, as bringing with it the gift of Christ's righteousness. The very act of correspondence by faith is the appropriation of His righteousness. This act is a moral act; it is a righteous act; it is the man's own act, because it is an act of his will. But, it would be impossible for him to do such an act, unless the Grace in response to which he did it conferred upon him the righteousness of Christ, whereby alone he can do anything righteous. Not only does he make the righteousness of Christ his own when he corresponds, but he can correspond for no other reason than because this righteousness is essentially justifying, because its function is to make him righteous. It is desirable to bear in mind that Grace is simply the enabling, but not irresistible, force of the Lord's Perfect Obedience as it is available for us. It is thus said to have its source in the Precious Blood, as representing the power of a clean life. In another aspect it is the vital force of Christ's Mystical Body and, in so far as its action is not resisted by the will, its results are the same in the members as in the Head.

It is sound theology to think of Justification as a process and not to distinguish it as an initial act from Sanctification as a later process. All along, from first to last, it is the work of Grace to make men righteous. When they grow in Grace, they grow in righteousness; with equal truth, they grow in holiness. There can be no holiness which is not righteousness.

It is also important to think of faith as a moral act, of the life of faith as a moral habit. The scholastic phrase, fides caritate formata, a rendering of the πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη of Gal. v. 6, has much to commend it; it fails, however, to express the force of the middle voice in ἐνεργουμένη. Faith is essentially an ἐνέργεια, and in its working it is love.

XVI.

THE IMPECCABILITY OF CHRIST.

The fact that our Lord was, during His Incarnate life on earth, impeccable is founded in the inability of His human will to consent to temptation. His human will could not consent to temptation, because it was the will of a Divine Person. If His human will could have consented to temptation, then He, very God, could have sinned. But, none the less, nay the more, did He experience the full force of temptation from without. The force of temptation is experienced in proportion to the resistance offered to it. Our Lord offered such resistance as wholly to overcome temptation. No one but He has ever offered in this degree successful resistance to temptation. Thus no one but He has ever experienced the full force of temptation. See S. Anselm, Cur Deus Homo, ii. 10.

MORTAL SIN.

The distinction between Mortal and Venial Sin is recognized by the English Church in the Litany. It is, probably, based upon S. Paul's language in I Cor. vi. 9, 10. Strictly speaking Mortal Sin is a state of the soul, in which the Holy Ghost has been so far resisted that Habitual Grace has been lost. The state of Grace and the state of Mortal Sin are mutually exclusive. The latter state is brought about partly by the essential gravity of the offence committed, partly by the accidental conditions under which it has been committed. Thus offences which in themselves may be venial produce, when deliberately persisted in, the state of Mortal Sin. On the other hand, an offence very grave in itself may, in the absence of deliberation, be venial. Mortal Sin always pre-supposes an actus deliberatus ratione. The value of the distinction in question consists very largely in the emphasis laid upon deliberation. So far from there being any intention to condone Venial Sin, it is intended to insist upon the insidious facility with which seeming trifles may raise a cloud between the soul and God. Under all conditions, sin as sin is offensive to God, but it belongs to Him, as "a Righteous Judge, strong and patient," to distinguish between the conditions.

THE PREDESTINARIANISM OF S. AUGUSTINE.

S. Augustine was the first to elaborate a theory of Predestination. His earlier view was that men are predestined by God conditionally upon their praevisa merita. His later view was that they are predestined by God unconditionally, that is to say, independently of their praevisa merita. According to the second view, in the case of those who are predestined to Glory, Grace is irresistible and is necessarily the Grace of Final Perseverance. See Mozley, Treatise upon the Augustinian Theory of Predestination.

CALVINISM AND ARMINIANISM.

Calvin taught the later Augustinian doctrine of an unconditional Predestination. The question as to whether Adam was included in such Predestination divided the Calvinists into Sub-lapsarians, who held that he was not, and Supra-lapsarians, who held that he was so included.

Arminius held, at any rate at the end of his life, a doctrine very similar to the earlier view taken by S. Augustine, that Predestination is conditional upon praevisa merita. He maintained that the will is free in its correspondence with the Grace of God, Whose Son died for all mankind. For the history of the Arminian Remonstrance (1610), and of the Synod of Dort (1618), see Hardwick, History of the Articles, pp. 190 ff., Ed. 1888; Hallam, Constit. Hist. i. pp. 400 ff., Ed. 1867.

There is an interesting appreciation both of the doctrine of Sufficient Grace, upon which the Jesuits insisted so strongly in their controversy with the Jansenists, and of the Calvinistic doctrine of Predestination in Pater's essay upon Pascal. Of the former Pater writes that it is "a very pleasant doctrine conducive to the due feeding of the whole flock of Christ, as being, or assuming them to be, what they really are, at the worst, God's silly sheep." In the Calvinistic doctrine Pater finds a recognition of certain seemingly irresistible impulses both to good and to evil of which we have experience in mankind. See Pater, Pascal; A. C. Benson, Walter Pater (English Men of Letters), p. 171, Ed. 1906; Beard, History of Port Royal, passim.

THE PAPAL INFALLIBILITY.

It is worth remembering that the point of the Vatican Decree of 1870 upon this subject is the denial of the principle that the consensus post of the Church is the criterion of Catholic doctrine. The words are explicit. The ex cathedra definitions of the Pope are infallible "vi sua, non e consensu Ecclesiae," by reason of a special Divine assistentia vouchsafed to S. Peter and to his successors. This it was that shocked the historical sense of theologians like Döllinger.

THE INTERMEDIATE STATE.

This state is generally referred to in Holy Scripture under the name of Hades, whether the reference be to those who die in Grace or to those who do not. Without any restriction of the uncovenanted mercies of God, but simply recognizing that this life is the covenanted period of probation, the Church has held that, immediately after death, the soul receives its Particular Judgment, an anticipation for the individual of the sentence to be pronounced before men and angels at the General Judgment of the Last Day. In the interval the soul is not, surely, left to itself. "The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God," Who deals with them by way of preparation for final blessedness. We cannot think of the most saintly as passing out of this world in perfect holiness. Holiness is a matter of character. Character changes by a gradual process of development. We speak of such development as being, on the one hand, a purification from dross, a painful discipline, a subjugation of self, and, on the other hand, an edification, a happy growth, an emancipation of self. If this be so, it is reasonable to believe that the Church can by prayer promote the spiritual welfare of the faithful departed. The early Liturgies, representing the practice of at latest the Fourth Century, distinguish two conditions amongst the faithful departed, that in which they "opitulatione indigent" and that in which they "beatitudine gaudent," suggesting that some have passed through the period of development, while others have not. See Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, i. passim; Pusey, What is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment, p. 111;

THE ELEVATION THEORY OF THE EPISCOPATE.

This theory, associated with the great name of Dr Lightfoot, is argued somewhat as follows:

In Apostolic days πρεσβύτεροι and ἐπίσκοποι were one Order, and there are no traces of monepiscopal government, at any rate in the communities of Gentile Christians. The functions of S. Timothy at Ephesus and of S. Titus at Crete were of the nature of temporary delegations of Apostolic authority. The evidence as to Sub-Apostolic conditions which is furnished by such writers as S. Clement of Rome and S. Polycarp suggests that local churches were frequently ruled by a College of Presbyters, one of whom became in course of time and from various circumstances the representative of the rest. Stress is laid upon the fact that in the Didaché great prominence is given to an order of Prophets.

The devolution theory, on the other hand, regards the Episcopate as having been implicit, as were the other Orders, in the Apostolate. This theory seems to account for the case of S. James at Jerusalem and of S. John, associated, probably, with S. Andrew and S. Philip, in Asia Minor more naturally than does the other. Dr Lightfoot himself did not regard his theory as impairing the truth that Episcopacy is of Apostolic origin, although it has certainly been understood to support not only Presbyterianism but even Congregationalism.

The question as to Episcopal Ordination is not necessarily involved in the theory of the genesis of the Episcopate. If we grant a stage in the life of certain churches in which the government was in the hands of a College of Presbyters, it does not follow that Presbyters conferred the Grace of Orders. Indeed, nothing points to such a fact. The cases of supposed Presbyterian Ordination cited by Dr Hatch (Bampton Lectures, pp. 108 ff., 1st Edition) are discussed by Dr Gore. In the first case, that of Paphnutius, it is shown that the terms used by Cassian (Collation. iv. 1), "ad diaconii est praelatus officium," and "presbyterii honore provexit," are much more indefinite than other terms used where it is quite certain that nomination merely and not Ordination is intended. There are instances in which the action of kings and other lay persons in respect of appointment to ecclesiastical office is described by such words as creare, and even ordinare. In the case of a supposed Ordination to the Diaconate by the Presbyter Novatus the term used is "constituit." But in the immediate context a reference is made to the fact that Novatus also "episcopum fecit" at Rome just as he "diaconum fecerat" in Africa. Now this "episcopum facere" was a Consecration by three Bishops, and there is every probability that the "diaconum facere" was equally valid, and that in the one case, as in the other, Novatus procured by the hands of the Episcopate the result which he desired (S. Cyprian, Epist. lii. 2; Euseb., Hist. Eccl. vi. 43). See Lightfoot, Ep. Philip., The Christian Ministry, passim; Gore, The Ministry of the Church, passim, and App., Notes, A, and E; Dale, Manual of Congregational Principles, App. p. 216. Consult also Döllinger, First Age of the Church, and Shirley, The Church in the Apostolic Age.

THE REAL PRESENCE.

The denial of a Corporal Presence of our Lord in the Holy Eucharist is not intended to exclude the Presence of His Glorified Body. "As to what the 'body of glory' is, silence is our best wisdom. We feel sure indeed that He retains 'all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature'; and with S. John we believe that He not only has come, but also is to come again in the flesh......It is enough for us to know that in the perfection of our nature, but in glory inconceivable, He still exists; and it is out of this glory that He feeds us with the flesh and blood which are spirit and life" (Gore, The Body of Christ, pp. 129 f., Ed. 1001). The word "corporal" as used in this connection is rather equivalent to "carnal," understanding "carnal" to mean that transitory element in human nature which the Risen Lord excluded from Himself, when He said πνεθμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει καθως ἐμὲ θεωρεῖτε ἔχοντα (S. Luke xxiv. 39).

The authoritative doctrine of the Roman Church is opposed to the view that our Lord is locally present in the Blessed Sacrament. It maintains that while He is present therein sacramentally, He is naturally at the right hand of the Father. This exclusion of the idea of locality involves exclusion of the ideas both of distance and of motion. "Our Lord then neither descends from heaven upon our altars, nor moves when carried in procession. The visible species change their position, but He does not move" (Newman, Via Media, ii. p. 220, Ed. 1877). The body of the individual Christian is said to be and is the temple of the Holy Ghost, but He is not present therein locally.

Nevertheless He is present therein really; and He is also present therein objectively, that is to say, whether the Christian believes it or not, the Holy Ghost dwells in him. "Licet sit in coelo localiter, in corde justi spiritualiter, in multis locis Sacramentaliter, tamen manet [Christus] in Se conjunctus" (De Vener. Sacramento Altaris ex Op. Divi Thomae Excerptus, Aug. Taurin., 1888). Whether or not this work be S. Thomas's, it expresses the authoritative Roman view. See Concil. Trident., Sess. xiii. 1; Gore, The Body of Christ, pp. 88, 297, Ed. 1901.

THE PORRECTIO INSTRUMENTORUM.

The Porrectio or Traditio Instrumentorum is traceable, probably, to the Church's adaptation and consecration of the usages of the Empire. Part of the process whereby an Imperial official entered upon office was the Usurpatio Juris, which consisted in the actual exercise of his function. When this actual exercise was impossible it was symbolized by a Traditio Instrumenti, for example, the giving of a sword by the Emperor to the Prefect of the Pretorian Guard (Dio Cass., Hist. Rom. 68, 16). In the English Ordinal we have an illustration of this principle in the reading of the Gospel by a newly ordained Deacon. This theory of its origin may serve to explain the greater prominence given to the Porrectio in the West, where the Church was possessed by a stronger spirit of Imperialism than it was in the East. See Gore, Ministry of the Christian Church, pp. 185 f., Ed. 1889.

THE MORALITY OF WAR.

"Non regna propter reges, sed reges propter regna." These words of S. Thomas Aquinas express the Christian principle of government. They are not without their bearing upon the rightfulness of war. Few writers of later days have discussed this question, amongst others of abstract policy, in a more reverent or a more Christian spirit than has Mazzini. It is interesting to notice that in the Sixteenth Century the objection to bear arms at the command of the magistrate was made by men whose remaining political tenets were definitely anarchic, and whose social tenets were openly licentious and antinomian. The Anabaptist sectary who denounced military service claimed the right to establish a millennial state in which there were to be no magistrates and no tribunals of justice, no property and no family. He has had, possibly he has, his successors. He appeared in this country for the first time about the year 1538. In that year a Royal Commission instructed the Bishops to deal drastically with the Anabaptists. In 1540 they were excepted from the Royal Pardon as persons who held, amongst other things, "that no man's laws ought to be obeyed," "that every manner of death, with the time and hour thereof, is so certainly prescribed, appointed and determined to every man of God, that neither any prince by his sword can alter it, nor any man by his own wilfulness prevent or change it," "that all things be common and nothing several." It was with a fatalistic anarchism of this type that the refusal to do military service was associated. See Wilkins, Concil. iii. 836, 843, 847; Möhler, Symbolism, ii. 155 ff., E.T.; Hardwick, Hist. Articles, pp. 33, 86 ff.; Mazzini, Thoughts on Democracy in Europe, passim.
